PREFACE.

THE author has again been required to subject his Medical Lexicon to a thorough revision. The progress of Medical Science, and the consequent introduction of new subjects and terms, demanded this; and he has embraced the occasion to render more complete the etymology and accentuation of the terms. On no previous revision has so much time and labor been expended by him. Some idea may be formed of this, from the fact, that although the page has been augmented in all its dimensions, not fewer than between sixty and seventy pages have been added.

As the author has remarked on former occasions, it has ever been his ardent wish to make the work a satisfactory and desirable — if not indispensable — lexicon, in which the inquirer may search, without disappointment, for every term that has been legitimated in the nomenclature of the science; and he confidently presents this edition as having more claims on the attention of the practitioner and student than its predecessors.

Once more the author gladly seizes the opportunity afforded him to express his grateful acknowledgments for the vast amount of favor which has been extended to the Dictionary.

PREFACE

TO THE SECOND EDITION.

THE present undertaking was suggested by the frequent complaints, made by the author's pupils, that they were unable to meet with information on numerous topics of professional inquiry,—especially of recent introduction,—in the medical dictionaries accessible to them.

It may, indeed, be correctly affirmed, that we have no dictionary of medical subjects and terms which can be looked upon as adapted to the state of the science. In proof of this, the author need but remark, that he has found occasion to add several thousand medical terms, which are not to be met with in the only medical lexicon at this time in circulation in the country.

The present edition will be found to contain many hundred more terms than the first, and to have experienced numerous additions and modifications.

The author's object has not been to make the work a mere lexicon or dictionary of terms, but to afford, under each, a condensed view of its various medical relations, and thus to render the work an epitome of the existing condition of medical science. In its preparation he has freely availed himself of the English, French and German works of the same nature, and has endeavored to add every subject and term of recent introduction, which has fallen under his notice; yet, with all his care, it will doubtless be found that subjects have been omitted. The numerous additions, however, which he has made, and his strong desire to be useful, "by removing rubbish and clearing obstructions from the paths through which learning and genius press forward to conquest and glory," will, he trusts, extenuate these and other objections that might be urged against the work; especially when the toil which every compiler of a dictionary must endure, is taken into consideration; a toil which has been so forcibly depicted by the great English Lexicographer, as well as by the distinguished SCALIGER, [in an epigram written after he had made an index to the "Inscriptions" of GRUTER:

"Si quem dura manet sententia Judicis olim,
Damnatum ærumnis suppliciisque caput;
Illunc neque fabrili lassent ergastula massâ
Nec rigidas vexent fossæ metalla manus,
Lexica contexat; nam cætera quid moror? Omnes
Pœnarum facies hic labor unus habet."

Thus freely rendered in French:—]

"Si quelqu'un a commis quelque crime odieux,
S'il a tué son père, ou blasphémé les Dieux,
Qu'il fasse un Lexicon: s'il est supplice au monde
Qui le punisse mieux, je veux que l'on me tonde."

EXPLANATION.

If the simple synonymy of any term be desired, a mere reference to the term may be sufficient; but if farther information, as to meaning or accentuation, be needed, it may be obtained under the term referred to. For instance, under Cimicifuga, reference is made to Actæa racemosa, as a synonyme. This may be sufficient for the inquirer; but should he desire to know the accentuation and properties of the plant, he must turn to Actæa racemosa. In the same manner, the French word Tronc is defined Trunk. This may be sufficient: should it not, the requisite information may be found under Trunk. In terms of more words than one, the definition is generally given under the more significant word; but, if not, it will be found under the other:—Respiratory murmur, for example, is defined under Murmur; Shaking palsy, under Palsy; Musculus succingens, under Musculus; Ocular spectrum, under Spectrum.

When the orthography of the French term is the same as that of the English, or with the mere difference of an accented vowel in the former, the term is not always repeated.

It is inserted, tendinous, into the internal os sesamoideum and root of the first bone of the great toe. Use, to pull the great toe from the rest.

The name Abductor has been given also to all those interosseous muscles of the hand and foot, which perform the motion of abduction on the fingers or toes, and to muscles which execute the same function in other parts of the body.

Aberration of Refrangibil'ity, Chromat'ic aberra'tion, (F.) Aberration de Réfrangibilité, Chromatisme, exists, when, as in a common lens, the rays that pass near the circumference of the lens are decomposed, so that a coloured image is observed. This aberration in the human eye is corrected by the iris, which does not permit the rays to fall near the circumference of the lens, and also by the crystalline lens itself, which, owing to its structure, serves the purposes of an achromatic glass.

Aberration, Spherical, Aberration of sphericity.

Aberration of Spheric'ity or spher'ical aberra'tion takes place, when the rays, as in a common lens, which pass through the centre of the lens, and those which pass near the circumference, are unequally refracted, so that they do not meet at a common focus.

This aberration of sphericity in the human eye is corrected by the iris and lens.

Absorbent System is the collection of vessels, Vasa absorben'tia seu resorben'tia, and glands, which concur in the exercise of absorption.

ABSORPTIO, Absorption—a. Sanguinis, Hæmorrhophesis.

ABSORP'TION, (same etymon as Absorbent), Absorp'tio, Resorp''tio, Inhala'tio, Imbibit''io, Anar'rhophē, Anarrophe'sis, Catapino'sis, Rhœbde'sis, Catarrhophe'sis, Catar'rhophē. The function of absorbent vessels, by virtue of which they take up substances from without or within the body. Two great divisions have been made of this function. 1. External absorption, or the absorption of composition, which obtains, from without the organs, the materials intended for their composition; and, 2. Internal absorption, or the absorption of decomposition, which takes up from the organs the materials that have to be replaced.

By external absorption is meant not only that which takes place at the external surface of the body, but also that of the mucous membranes of the digestive and respiratory passages. Hence, again, the division of external absorption into cuta'neous — resorp'tio cuta'nea seu cu'tis, inhala'tio cu'tis, — intes'tinal or diges'tive, and pulmonary or res'piratory.

Internal absorption is also subdivided into, 1. Molec'ular or interstit''ial, nu'tritive, organ'ic, or decompo'sing, which takes up from each organ the materials that constitute it, so that the decomposition is always in equilibrio with the deposition. 2. The absorption of recrementit''ial secre'ted flu'ids, such as the fluid of serous membranes, synovia, &c. As these are constantly exhaled on surfaces which have no external outlet, they would augment indefinitely if absorption did not remove them in the same proportion as that in which they are deposited. 3. The absorption of a part of the excrementit''ial secre'ted flu'ids, as they pass over the excretory passages.

The great agents of external absorption are the veins and chyliferous vessels; of internal absorption, probably the lymphatics. In the chyliferous vessels and lymphatics the fluid is always found to possess the same general properties. In them, therefore, an action of elaboration or selection must have taken place. The veins, on the other hand, seem to exert no selection. Any fluid, possessing the necessary tenuity, passes through the coats of the vessel readily by imbibition, and proceeds along with the torrent of the circulation. Watery fluids in this manner enter the blood when they are taken into the stomach. Substances that require digestion, on the other hand, may pass through the chyliferous vessels and thoracic duct.

tum, is formed of this strong acid, f℥x; Camphor, ℥j; Alcohol, f℥j.

A strong Acetic Acid was ordered by the London pharmacopœia, prepared from wood. It was called Vinegar of wood, Improved distilled Vinegar, Pyroligʹneous Acid, Acetum Ligoʹrum, and its strength was such, that 87 gr. of crystallized subcarbonate of soda should saturate 100 grains of the acid.

A. tenʹuē* seu debilʹius, Acetum destillaʹtum, Acidum aceticum, Acidum Aceteʹum destillaʹtum, Distilʹled vinʹegar, (F.) Acide Acétique faible, Vinaigre distillé, is prepared by distilling vinegar, until seven-eighths have passed over. By others, however, the terms are applied to Pyroxylʹic Spirit. A limpid, colourless liquid, having a peculiarly penetrating and slightly empyreumatic odour. Its density in the liquid state, is almost the same as that of alcohol, 0.7921. Its taste is disagreeable, and analogous to that of peppermint. It is miscible in all proportions with water, alcohol, and ether. It may be prepared by distilling a mixture of two parts of crystallized acetate of lead and one part of quicklime in a salt-glaze jar (gray-beard,) the lower part of the jar being coated with fire-clay; and a bent glass tube, half an inch in diameter, adapted to the mouth by a cork, so as to form a distillatory apparatus. The jar is supported on the mouth of a small furnace, by which the lower part only is heated to redness, and the vapours are conducted into a Liebig's condenser. The product is repeatedly redistilled from quicklime, until its boiling point is constant at 132°.

It was brought forward as a remedy in phthisis pulmonalis: but evidently with unfounded pretensions. It is an excitant, and may be serviceable in chronic bronchitis. The dose is ten to forty drops three times a day, diluted with water.

It is in delicate silky needles, usually somewhat yellowish, inodorous, and of a harsh, somewhat astringent taste. It dissolves in one hundred parts of cold and three parts of boiling water. It is very soluble in alcohol, and but slightly so in ether.

It has been highly extolled in internal hemorrhage, especially from the urinary organs and uterus. Dose from ten to twenty grains.

The Pharmacopœia of the United States directs it to be made by exposing a thin paste of powdered galls and distilled water for a month, adding the water from time to time to preserve the consistence; expressing the paste; boiling the residue in distilled water; filtering through animal charcoal, and crystallizing.

Air is essentially composed of two gases, oxygen and nitrogen, in the proportion of about 20 of the former, to 80 of the latter. Oxygen is the vital portion, but the nitrogen is necessary to dilute it. Air also contains a small portion of carbonic acid gas, and has always floating in it aqueous vapour, different terrestrial emanations, etc. Its effects upon the human body vary according to its greater or less density, temperature, moisture, etc. Change of air is found extremely serviceable in the prevention and cure of certain morbid conditions. AL'CHYMY, Al'chemy, Alchemi'a, Alchimi'a, Adep'ta Philosoph'ia, (from al, an Arabic particle, signifying, 'superiority, excellence,' and Chimia, 'Chymistry.') This word was formerly synonymous with Chymistry; but, from the 7th century it has been applied to the mysterious art of endeavouring to discover a universal remedy, and a mode of transmuting the baser metals into gold: an operation to which they gave the name O'pus mag'num, and Philoso'pher's stone.

Alchymy has also been called Scien'tia vel Philosoph'ia Hermet'ica, from an idea that Hermes or Mercury was its inventor. Harris has well defined this chimerical art: 'Ars sine arte, cujus principium est mentiri, medium laborare, et finis mendicare.'

AL'COHOL, gen. Alcoho'lis, Al'cahol, Al'choöl, Al'kol, Al'col, Al'cool, Al'kool. An Arabic word, formerly used for an impalpable powder, and signifying 'very subtile, much divided.' At the present day it is applied to highly rectified spirit of wine:—see Spiritus rectificatus or rectified spirit, distilled from dried subcarbonate of potassa. In the Ph. U. S., Alcohol is rectified spirit of the specific gravity 0.835. The Dublin college has a spiritus fortior, used in the preparation of certain essences, whose specific gravity is 0.818, and the Pharmacopœia of the United States an Alcohol For'tius, strong'er al'cohol, s. g. 0.817. Alcohol, absolute alcohol, of the Edinburgh and Dublin Pharmacopœias, is of specific gravity 0.797.

Alcohol is an inflammable liquor, lighter than water, of a warm, acrid taste, colourless, transparent, and of a pungent, aromatic smell. It is the product of the distillation of vinous liquors; is miscible with water in all proportions, and is the direct solvent of resins, balsams, &c. Various other vegetable principles are soluble in it, and hence it is used, in different states of concentration, in the preparation of elixirs, tinctures, essences, &c.

Alcohol acts on the animal body as a powerful stimulus: as such, in a dilute form, it is used in the prevention and cure of disease. Its habitual and inordinate use is the cause of many serious affections, of a chronic character especially, as visceral obstructions, dropsy, &c.

The study of aliments forms one of the most important branches of hygiene. Properly, all substances, organic or inorganic, that enter into the composition of organized beings are aliments.

As regards the immediate principles which predominate in their composition, they have been classed, but imperfectly, as follows:—

TABLE OF ALIMENTS.

1. Feculaceous.	Wheat, barley, oats, rye, rice, Indian corn, potato, sago, peas, beans, &c.
2. Mucilaginous.	Carrot, salsify, beet, turnip, asparagus, cabbage, lettuce, artichoke, melon, &c.
3. Saccharine.	Sugar, fig, date, raisin, apricot, &c.
4. Acidulous.	Orange, currant, gooseberry, cherry, peach, strawberry, raspberry, mulberry, prune, pear, apple, sorrel, &c.
5. Oleaginous and Fatty.	Cocoa, olive, sweet almond, nut, walnut, animal fat, oil, butter, &c.
6. Caseous.	Different kinds of milk, cheese.
7. Gelatinous.	Tendon, aponeurosis, true skin, cellular texture; very young animals.
8. Albuminous.	Brain, nerve, eggs, &c.
9. Fibrinous.	Flesh and blood.

Dr. Prout has four great classes — the aqueous, saccharine, oleaginous, and albuminous: — Dr. Pereira, twelve—aqueous, mucilaginous or gummy, saccharine, amylaceous, ligneous, pectinaceous, acidulous, alcoholic, oily or fatty, proteinaceous, gelatinous, and saline. Liebig divides them into two classes: — the NITROGENIZED OR PLASTIC ELEMENTS OF NUTRITION, in which he comprises vegetable fibrin, vegetable albumen, vegetable casein, flesh and blood; and the NON-NITROGENIZED OR ELEMENTS OF RESPIRATION, in which he comprises fat, starch, gum, cane sugar, grape sugar, sugar of milk, pectin, bassorin, wine, beer, and spirits. The former alone, in his view, are inservient to the nutrition of organized tissue: the latter are burnt in respiration, and furnish heat.

The following simple arrangement is, perhaps, as little objectionable as any:—

1. Nitrogenized Aliments,	Fibrinous (Glutinous?) Albuminous. Caseinous, Gelatinous.
2. Non-nitrogenized Aliments,	Amylaceous. Saccharine. Oleaginous.
3. Inorganic.

The second division might be still further simplified, inasmuch as amylaceous aliments are convertible into sugar during the digestive process; and, from both, oleaginous matter may be formed.

Aliments are, at times, divided into the substantive, and the adjective or accessory; the former comprising all the nutritive substances, which are used as food; the latter condiments. See Condiment.

The term is, now, almost restricted to agents, which produce such effect by being received into the lungs in the form of vapours or gases, and passing with the blood to the nervous centres on which their action is exerted. Perhaps, as a general rule, the intellectual faculties first feel their influence, — a sort of intoxication supervening, with imperfect power of regulating the movements; the sensory ganglia become afterwards or simultaneously affected, sensation and motion are suspended, and ultimately, if the quantity inhaled be sufficient, the medulla oblongata has its actions suspended or destroyed, respiration ceases, and death is the consequence. Different agents have been used as anæsthetics by way of inhalation—sulphuric ether, chloroform, chloric ether, compound ether, chlorohydric and nitric ethers, bisulphuret of carbon, chloride of olefiant gas, benzin, aldehyde, light coal-tar naphtha, &c.; but the first four are alone employed. They have been, and are, greatly used in serious surgical operations, and during parturition; and in such cases, as well as in many diseases, especially of a painful nature, produce the most beneficial results.

ANAT'OMY, (ανατομη,) Anat'omē, Anatom'ia. Anathom'ia, Prosec'tio, (from ανα, and τεμνειν, 'to cut.') (F.) Anatomie. The word Anatomy properly signifies dissection; but it has been appropriated to the study and knowledge of the number, shape, situation, structure, and connection — in a word, of all the apparent properties of organized bodies. Anatomy is the science of organization. Some have given the term a still more extended accep-tation, applying it to every mechanical decomposition, even of inorganic bodies. Thus Crystallog'raphy has been termed the Anatomy of crystallized minerals. Anatomy has also been called Morphol'ogy, Somatol'ogy, Somatot'omy, Orgonol'ogy, etc. It assumes different names, according as the study is confined to one organized being, or to a species or class of beings. Thus, Androt'omy, or Anthropot'omy, or Anthropag'raphy, or Anthroposomatol'ogy, is the Anatomy of Man; Zoöt'omy, that of the other species of the animal kingdom; and Vet'erinary Anat'omy is the anatomy of domestic animals; but when the word is used abstractly, it means Hu'man Anatomy, and particularly the study of the organs in a physiological or healthy state. Physiolog''ical Anatomy is occasionally used to signify the kind of anatomy which investigates structure with a special view to function. The Anatomy of the diseased human body is called Patholog''ical or Mor'bid Anatomy, and when applied to Medical Jurisprudence, Foren'sic Anatomy. Several of the organs possessing a similarity of structure, and being formed of the same tissues, they have been grouped into Systems or Genera of Organs; and the study of, or acquaintance with, such systems, has been called Gen'eral Anat'omy, Histol'ogy, or Morphot'omy, whilst the study of each organ in particular has been termed Descrip'tive or Spec''ial Anatomy, Anthropomorphol'ogy. Histol'ogy is however, more frequently applied to the Anatomy of the Tis'sues, which is called, also, Tex'tural and Microscop'ic Anatomy, Micranotom'ia, see Histology. Descriptive Anatomy has been divided into Skeletol'ogy, which comprises Osteol'ogy and Syndesmol'ogy; and Sarcol'ogy, which is subdivided into Myol'ogy, Neurol'ogy, Angiol'ogy, Adenol'ogy, Splanchnol'ogy, and Dermol'ogy. Sur'gical Anat'omy, Medicochirurgical Anat'omy, Topograph'ical Anat'omy, Re'gional Anat'omy, (F.) Anatomie Chirurgicale, A. des Régions, is the particular and relative study of the bones, muscles, nerves, vessels, etc., with which it is indispensable to be acquainted before performing operations. Compar'ative or Analog''ical Anatomy is the comparative study of each organ, with a view to an acquaintance with the modifications of its structure in different animals, or in the different classes of animals; whilst Homolog''ical Anatomy examines the relations to each other of the different parts of the same individual. Transcendent'al or. Philosoph'ical Anatomy inquires into the mode, plan, or model upon which the animal frame or organs are formed; Artifi'cial Anat'omy is the art of modelling and representing, in wax or other substance, the different organs or different parts, of the human body, in the sound or diseased state; and Clas'tic Anat'omy (F.) Anatomie Clastique, (κλαω, 'to break,') in the language of Auzous, is the formation of models in such sort, that they can be broken or separated into pieces. Phytot'omy and Phytanat'omy is the anatomy of vegetables, and Picto'rial Anatomy, anatomy artistically illustrated.

Properly, Aneurism signifies a tumour, produced by the dilatation of an artery; but it has been extended to lesions of arteries, as well as to dilatations of the heart.

There are various kinds of aneurism. The following are the chief:

I. When the blood, which forms the tumour, is enclosed within the dilated coats of the artery. This is the true Aneurism, Aneurys'ma ve'rum, Her'nia Arteria'rum, (F.) Anévrysme vrai.

II. When the blood has escaped from the opened artery, it is called spu'rious or false An'eurism, Aneuris'ma spu'rium, Ruptu'ra Arte'riæ, Arteriorrhex'is, Arteriodial'ysis, Ecchymo'ma arterio'eum, (F.) Anévrysme faux. The latter is divided into three varieties. 1. Diffused False An'eurism, (F.) Anév yesme faux, primitif, diffus, noncirconscrit ou par infiltration, which occurs immediately after the division or rupture of an artery, and consists of an extravasation of blood into the areolar texture of the part. 2. Cir'cumscribed False An'eurism, (F.) Anévryseme faux consécutif, circonscrit ou par épanchement, enkysté ou sacciforme, tumeur hémorrhagiale circonscrite, in which the blood issues from the vessel some time after the receipt of the wound, and forms itself a sac in the neighbouring areolar tissue. 3. Aneurism by Anastomo'sis, Var'icose or Cir'soid An'eurism, Phlebarteriodial'ysis, Aneurys'ma veno'svärterio'sum, A. varico'sum, (F.) Anévryseme par anastomose ou varriqueux, A. par érosion, A. de Pott, A des plus petites artères, which arises from the simultaneous wounding of an artery and a vein; — the arterial blood passing into the vein, and producing a varicose state of it.

III. Mix'ed An'eurism, (F.) Anévryseme mixte, is that which arises from the dilatation of one or two of the coats, with division or rupture of the other. Some authors have made two varieties of this:—1. Mixed exter'nal An'eurism, where the internal and middle coats are ruptured, and the areolar is dilated. 2. Mixed inter'nal An'eurism, in which the internal coat is dilated, and protrudes, like a hernial sac, through the ruptured middle and outer coats. This variety has been called Aneurys'ma Her'niam Arte'riæ sistens.

Aneurisms have been termed traumat'ic or exog''enous, and sponta'neous, according as they may have been caused by a wound, or have originated spontaneously. The latter, when originating from lesions of the inner coats of arteries, have been termed endog''enous. They have also been divided into inter'nal and exter'nal.

The internal aneurisms are situate in the great splanchnic cavities, and occur in the heart and great vessels of the chest, abdomen, &c. Their diagnosis is difficult, and they are often inaccessible to surgical treatment.

The external aneurisms are situate at the exterior of the head, neck, and limbs, and are distinctly pulsatory.

Aneurisms, especially the internal, may be combated by a debilitant treatment, on the plan of Valsalva, which consists in repeated blood-letting, with food enough merely to support life. In external aneurism, the artery can be obliterated. This is usually done by applying a ligature above the aneurismal tumour.

Aneurism by Anastomosis, see Aneurism — a. Brasdor's operation for, see Brasdor — a. Cirsoid, see Aneurism.

Aneurism, Dissect'ing, is one in which, owing to rupture of the inner and middle coats of an artery, the blood makes itself a channel between these coats and the outer coat.

In many cases, the lesion appears to consist in a separation of the laminæ of the middle coat, between which the blood forms itself a channel.

Aneurism, Endogenous, see Aneurism, and Endogenous — a. Exogenous, see Aneurism, and Exogenous — a. External, see Aneurism — a. False, see Aneurism — a. False, circumscribed, see Aneurism — a. False, diffused, see Aneurism.

Aneurism of the Heart, Cardion'chus, Cardieurys'ma, Cardianeurys'ma, (F.) Anévryseme du cœur, has been divided into active and passive. The former can scarcely be esteemed aneurisms, as they most commonly consist of increased thickness of the parietes of the heart, which diminishes its cavity instead of increasing it. The term Hypertrophy of the heart better indicates their character. Pas'sive an'eurism, Cardiec'tasis, on the contrary, is attended with extenuation of the parietes of the organ, and enlargement of the cavities. The physical signs of dilata'tion of the heart are the following: — The action of the heart is not visible, and no impulse is conveyed to the hand. On percussion, there is a loss of resonance over a larger surface than usual, but the dulness is much less intense than that which accompanies hypertrophy. On auscultation, the action of the heart is only slightly felt, and communicates at once the impression of its diminished power. The impulse is feebler than usual. Both sounds are widely transmitted over the thorax, and are not much fainter at a distance from their point of origin.

Par'tial or true an'eurism of the Heart—Cardiec'tasis partia'lis, Aneurys'ma consecuti'vum cor'dis — is sometimes seen; rarely, however.

The name Aneurism of the Valves of the Heart has been given to pouch-like projections of the valves into the auricles.

It appears to be neuropathic, and has been termed Neural'gia of the Heart. Some, however, employ this last term for an acutely painful intermittent affection of the heart, which seems to differ from angina pectoris more in regard to the small number of parts which are drawn into morbid consent with the affected cardiac nerves, than in regard either to its nature or appropriate treatment. The most powerful stimulating and narcotic antispasmodics are required during the paroxysm.

ANGLE, An'gulus, (αγκυλος, 'a hook.') The pace between two lines which meet in a point.

ANGLE, FA'CIAL, pointed out by Camper, is formed by the union of two lines, one of which is drawn from the most prominent part of the forehead to the alveolar edge of the upper jaw, opposite the incisor teeth — the facial line — and the other from the meatus auditorius externus to the same point of the jaw. According to the size of the angle it has been attempted to appreciate the respective proportions of the cranium and face, and, to a certain extent, the degree of intelligence of individuals and of animals. In the white varieties of the species, this angle is generally 80°; in the negro not more than 70°, and sometimes only 65°. As we descend the scale of animals, the angle becomes less and less; until, in fishes, it nearly or entirely disappears. Animals which have the snout long, and facial angle small, such as the snipe, crane, stork, &c., are proverbially foolish, at least they are so esteemed; whilst intelligence is ascribed to those in which the angle is more largely developed, as in the elephant and the owl. In these last animals, however, the large facial angle is caused by the size of the frontal sinuses:—so that this mode of appreciating the size of the brain is very inexact, and cannot be depended upon.

The following is a table of the angle in man and certain animals:

Man	from 68° to 88° and more.
Sapajou	65
Orang-Utang	56 to 58
Guenon	57
Mandrill	30 to 42
Coati	28
Pole-Cat	31
Pug-Dog	35
Mastiff	41
Hare	30
Ram	30
Horse	23

ANGLE, OCCIP'ITAL, OF DAUBENTON, is formed by a line drawn from the posterior margin of the foramen magnum to the inferior margin of the orbit, and another drawn from the top of the head to the space between the occipital condyles. In man, these condyles, as well as the foramen magnum, are so situate, that a line drawn perpendicular to them would be a continuation of the spine; but in animals they are placed more or less obliquely; and the perpendicular is necessarily thrown farther forward, and the angle rendered more acute.

The Anima of Stahl, An'ima Stahlia'na, was a fancied intelligent principle, which he supposed to preside over the phenomena of life,—like the Archæus of Van Helmont.

Under the term Anima Mun'di, the ancient philosophers meant a universal Spirit, which they supposed spread over every part of the universe.

The precise seat of the mind in the brain has given rise to many speculations. The point is unsettled.

With the ancient chemists, Anima meant the active principle of a drug separated by some chemical management.

AN'IMAL, Zo'ŏn. A name given to every animated being. Most animals have the power of locomotion; some can merely execute partial movements, such as contraction and dilatation. This formation seems to take place over the whole body, in the production of carbonic acid, and in other oxidizing processes, and to be connected with the changes in nutrition.

A table of the natural temperatures of many animals—that of man being 100°—is contained in the author's Human Physiology, vol. i., Art. Calorification.

The filtered liquor is placed on the fire in an iron vessel, and suffered to evaporate, until neither froth nor effervescence occurs, and the liquid presents a smooth surface like oil. To this, levigated coal is added in the proportion of 160 grammes to 192 grammes of potassa. The mixture is stirred, and removed from the fire, and the stirring is continued, until a black homogeneous powder results. A sulphuretted anthrakokali is made by mixing accurately 16 grammes of sulphur with the coal, and dissolving the mixture in the potassa, as directed above. The dose of the simple and the sulphuretted preparations is about two grains three times a day.

The definition by Dr. Good is sufficiently distinctive. Tumour, common to the surface; flat; firm; burning; penetrant; livid and vesicular; or crusty above, with a sordid and gangrenous core below; imperfectly suppurative. It sometimes prevails epidemically; is often owing to a peculiar cachectic condition, and may be induced by the reception of an animal infection into the organism; when it has received the names Anthrax malig'nus, Cacan'thrax, Anthra'cion, Vesic'ula gangrænes'cens, Anthracophlyc'tis, Pus'tula malig'na, (F.) Pustule maligne, Bouton malin, and is characterized at the outset by a vesication or bleb filled with a sero-sanguinolent fluid, under which a small induration is formed, surrounded by an areolar inflammation, which becomes gangrenous. It has been thought by some to be induced altogether by contact with the matter of the carbuncle of animals, or of the exuviæ of the bodies of such as had died of the disease, but is now known to arise primarily in the human subject. This form of carbuncle has received different names, many of them from the places where it has prevailed:—Oarbuncu'lus contagio'sus seu Gal'licus seu Hungu'ricus seu Polon'icus seu Septentriona'lis, Per'sicus ig'nis, Mor'bus pustulo'sus Fin'nicus, Pus'tula gangræno'sa seu liv'ida Estho'niæ, Pem'phigus Hunga'ricus, Puce de Bourgogne ou maligne, Feu Persique, Malvat de Languedoc.

Ap'oplexy. Apoplex'ia, (Sc.) Poplexy, (απο-πλῆξια, from αποπλῆττειν, 'to strike with violence.') At the present day, the term apoplexy is employed by many writers to signify interstit''ial hem'orrhage, (F.) Hémorrhagie interstitielle, or every effusion of blood, which occurs suddenly into the substance of an organ or tissue. Hence, we speak of cerebral apoplexy, pulmonary apoplexy, &c. &c. Formerly it was always—and still is by many—used in a restricted sense, to signify, in other words, the train of phenomena, which characterize cerebral apoplexy. This disease, Hæmorrhag''ia Cer'ebri, Aphro'nia, Ca'rus Apoplex'ia, Co'ma Apoplex'ia, Apoplex'ia cer'ebri sanguin'ea seu *cerebra'lis, Encephalorrhag''ia, San'guinis ic'tus, Hæmateneceph'alum, Pulpez'ia, Sidera'tio, Apilepsi'a, Mor'bus atton'itus, Gut'ta. It generally consists in pressure upon the brain; either from turgescence of vessels, or from extravasation of blood: hence the terms Hæmenceph'alus, Hémorrhagie cérébrale, and Hémoëncephalorrhagie, applied to it by some. The general prognosis is unfavourable; especially when it occurs after the age of 35. When Apoplexy is accompanied with a hard, full pulse, and flushed countenance, it is called Apoplex'ia sanguin'ea, Cataph'ora Co'ma; when with a feeble pulse and pale countenance, and evidences of serous effusion, Apoplex'ia sero'sa, A. pituito'sa, Se'rous Ap'oplexy, Cataph'ora hydrocephal'ica, Encephaloch'ysis seni'lis, Hydroceph'alus acu'tus se'num, (F.) Hydroëncephalorrhée of Piorry, Hydropisie cérébrale suraiguë, Hydrorrhagie.

ARCH'ES OF THE PAL'ATE. These are two in number on each side of the throat, one of which is termed anterior, the other posterior.

The anterior arch arises from the middle of the velum palati, at the side of the uvula, and is fixed to the edge of the base of the tongue.

The posterior arch has its origin, likewise, from the side of the uvula, and passes downwards to be inserted into the side of the pharynx. The anterior arch contains the circumflexus palati, and forms the isthmus faucium. The posterior arch has within it the levator palati, and between the arches are the tonsils.

ARCHÆ'US, Arche'us, (αρχη, 'commencement,'[?]) (F.) Archée. A word invented by Basil Valentine, and afterwards adopted by Paracelsus and Van Helmont. The latter used it for the internal principle of our motions and actions. This archæus, according to Van Helmont, immaterial principle, existing prior to fecundation, and presiding over the development of the body, and over all organic phenomena. Besides this chief archæus, whose seat Van Helmont placed in the upper orifice of the stomach, he admitted several of a subordinate character, which had to execute its orders; one, for instance, in each organ, to preside over its functions; each of them being subject to anger, caprice, terror, and every human feeling.

The Areometer of Baumé, which is the most used in Pharmacy, particularly in France, consists of a tube of glass, largely expanded towards its inferior extremity, and terminationg below by a small ball, containing mercury or lead, which serves it as a balance, so that it may remain upright in the fluid. This tube is furnished with a graduated scale. If the fluid into which the Areometer is plunged be heavier than water, the instrument rises; if lighter, it sinks. There are various Areometers, as those of the Dutch, of Fahrenheit, Nicholson, &c. The Areometer is also called Hydrom'eter, (F.) Hydromètre, Aréomètre, Pèsc-liqueur.

There are some hydrometers which have a general application for determining the specific gravities of liquids—as Fahrenheit's, Nicholson's, Guyton de Morveau's, and the common glass hydrometers, including Baumé's, Cartier's, Twaddle's, Zanetti's, and the specific gravity beads; others intended for special application—as for estimating the comparative strength of spirits; the comparative densities of syrups, oils, &c.—as Gay Lussac's, Sikes's, and Dicat's hydrometers, and the saccharometer, urinometer, and elæometer.

ARGEN'TI NI'TRAS, A. azo'tas, Argentum Nitra'tum seu Ni'tricum, Sal argenti, (F.) Nitrate ou Azotate d'Argent, Nitrate of Silver. This preparation is sometimes kept in crystals, the Ni'tras Argenti in crystal'los concre'tus, Nitrate d'Argent cristallisé of the Codex of Paris, Lu'na potabi'lis, Crystal'li Lu'næ, Argentum ni'tricum crystallisa'tum, Ni'tras argen'ti crystal'linus, Ni'trum luna'rē, Hydrago'gum Boyle'i: generally, however, it is in the fused state: and it is this which is admitted into most Pharmacopœias, and which, besides the name Argenti Nitras, is called Argenti ni'tras fusus seu fusa (Ph. U. S. 1863) seu fusum, Caus'ticum luna'rē, Lapis infernalis, Argen'tum ni'tricum fusum, and lunar caustic, (F.) Nitrate d'argent fondu, Pierre infernale. It may be prepared as follows:—Take of silver, in small pieces, ℥j; nitric acid, f℥vij, distilled water, f℥ij. Mix the acid with the water, and dissolve the silver in the mixture in a sand bath; then crystallize, or gradually increase the heat, so that the resulting salt may be dried. Melt this in a crucible over a gentle fire, and continue the heat until ebullition ceases; then immediately pour it into suitable moulds.

The virtues of nitrate of silver are tonic, and escharotic. It is given in chorea, epilepsy, &c.: locally, it is used in various cases as an escharotic. Dose, gr. 1–8 to gr. 1–4 in pill, three times a day.

When silver is combined with iodine, it is said to have the same effect as the nitrate, and not to produce the slate colour of the surface, which is apt to follow the protracted use of the latter.

Not used in medicine, unless in some places for silvering pills. Silver Leaf, Argen'tum folia'tum, is the state in which it is used for this purpose.

The Chlo'ride, (Argenti chlo'ridum, Argentum muriat'icum seu chlora'tum seu sali'tum. Chlorure'tum Argenti, Chlo'ruret or Mu'riate of Silver, (F.) Chlorure d'Argent); the Cyan'uret; the I'odide (Argenti Io'didum, Argentum Ioda'tum, Iodure'tum Argenti, Iod'uret of Silver, (F.) Iodure d'Argent;) the Ox'ide (Argenti ox'idum, Argentum oxyda'tum, (F.) Oxide d'Argent,) and the Chlo'ride of Ammo'nia and Sil'ver (Argenti et Ammo'niæ chlo'ridum, Argentum muriat'icum ammonia'tum, Chlorure'tum Argenti et Ammo'niæ, Chlo'ruret of Silver and Ammonia, Ammonio-chloride of Silver, (F.) Chlorure d'Argent et d'Ammoniaque,) have been used in syphilis. At first, these different preparations were administered intraleptically on the gums; the chloride, the cyanide and the iodide in the dose of 1–12th of a grain; the chloride of silver and ammonia in the dose of 1–14th of a grain, and the oxide of silver, and divided silver, in the dose of 1–8th and 1–4th of a grain. M. Serre, of Montpellier, who made many trials with them, soon found that these doses were too small; he therefore raised that of the chloride to 1–10th, and of the iodide to 1–8th of a grain, without any inconvenience resulting. The dose of the other preparations was likewise increased in a similar ratio. M. Serre extols the preparations of silver—used internally as well as intraleptically—as antisyphilities, but they are not to be depended upon.

The Cy'anide or Cyan'uret, Argenti Cyanure'tum seu Cyan'idum, Argentum cyanogena'tum, (F.) Cyanure d'argent, is thus directed to be prepared in the Pharmacopœia of the United States.—Nitrate of Silver, dissolved in distilled water, is put into a tubulated glass receiver: Ferrocyanuret of Potassium, dissolved in distilled water, is put into a tubulated retort, previously adapted to the receiver. Dilute Sulphuric Acid is added to the solution in the retort; and by means of a sand-bath and a moderate heat, distillation is carried on until the liquid that passes over no longer produces a precipitate in the receiver. The precipitate is then washed with distilled water, and dried.

Ox'ide of Sil'ver, Argenti Ox'idum, is made by precipitating a solution of the Nitrate of Silver by solution of Potassa, drying the precipitate. (Ph. U. S.)

Most commonly, however, it means a surgical operation, which consists in opening an artery, to draw blood from it. Arteriotomy is chiefly used in inflammatory affections of the head, when the blood is generally obtained from the temporal artery. See Bloodletting.

ARTERIOTREP'SIS, (arteria, and τρεψις, 'torsion.') Torsion of an artery with the view of obliterating it.

ARTERI'TIS, Arteri'tis, Inflamma'tio Arteriarum, (F.) Artérite, Inflammation des artères, (arteria and itis.) Inflammation of an artery. Inflammation of the inner coat of an artery is termed Endo-arteri'tis, or Endoarteri'tis; of the outer, Exo-arteri'tis or Exarteri'tis.

AR'TERY, Arte'ria, (F.) Artère, (from αηρ, 'air,' and τηρειν, 'to preserve,' quasi, 'receptacle of air,' because the ancients believed that it contained air. They, at first, gave the name Artery to the trachea, αρτηρια τραχεια, because it is filled with air; and afterwards they used the same term and angei'a pneumat'ica, αγγεια πνευματικα, for the arteries, properly so called, probably because they commonly found them empty in the dead body. We find, also, φλεβες to designate the arteries, called by the Latins Venæ micantes pulsat'iles.) Arteries, with the moderns, are the order of vessels, which arise from the two ventricles of the heart, and have valves only at their origin. They are cylindrical, firm, and elastic canals; of a yellowish-white colour; little dilatable; easily lacerable; and formed, 1. Of an external laminated, or areolar membrane, Tu'nica externa seu adventit''ia seu cellula'ris, Vagi'na cellula'ris, of a dense and close character. 2. Of a middle coat, Tu'nica me'dia seu elas'tica, composed of fibres, which do not, however, contract on the application of the galvanic stimulus, formed chiefly of elastic tissue, and also of smooth muscular fibres, and eminently elastic; and, 3. Of an inner coat, Tu'nica in'tima seu gla'bra, which is thin, diaphanous, reddish, and polished.

The use of the arteries is to carry the blood from the heart to the various parts of the system. It will be obvious, however, that they cannot all convey arterial blood. The pulmonary artery, for example, is destined to convey the venous blood to the lungs, there to be converted into arterial; whilst the pulmonary veins convey arterial blood back to the heart.

TABLE OF THE PRINCIPAL ARTERIES OF THE BODY.

All the arteries take their rise from the Pulmonary Artery, or the Aorta; and the names generally indicate the parts to which they are distributed.

I. ARTERIA PULMONALIS.

The Pulmonary Artery arises from the right ventricle, and soon divides into a right and left branch, one of which is distributed to each lung.

II. ARTERIA AORTA.

The Aorta arises from the left ventricle. It is the common trunk of the arteries of the body, and may be divided into five portions.

a. Arteries furnished by the Aorta at its origin.

1. A. Cardiaca or coronaria anterior.
2. A. Cardiaca or coronaria posterior.

b. Arteries furnished by the Aorta at its arch.

The arch of the Aorta gives off, to the left, two considerable trunks—the Arteria carotidea primitiva, and A. subclavia; and, to the right, a single trunk, which is larger—the A. innominata or Brachio-cephalica, which divides into the primitive carotid and subclavian.

Articular Arteries of the Arm, Circumflex arteries of the arm.

Articular Ar'teries of the Knee arise from the popliteal artery, and surround the tibio-femoral articulation. Although of a small size, they are important, as they furnish blood to the lower extremity after the operation for popliteal aneurism. They are distinguished into superior and inferior. The superior articular arteries, popliteal articular arteries, are commonly three in number; one of which is internal, another external, and another middle, the azygous artic'ular. The first, Ramus anastomot'icus magnus, anastomoses by one branch with the external circumflex, and by another with the external superior articular. The second anastomoses with the external circumflex, the superior internal articular, and the inferior external articular; and the third is distributed within the joint. The inferior articular arteries are two in number: an internal and an external. The former anastomoses with the internal superior articular and the external inferior articular. The latter anastomoses with the recurrent branch of the anterior tibial, and the external superior articular. To each articular artery there is an articular nerve.

ARTICULAR FACETTES' are the contiguous surfaces, by means of which the bones are articulated.

ARTICULAR PROCESSES, see Vertebræ.

It is a chronic disease, and not curable with facility. There are no pathognomonic physical signs of it. In some cases, the respiration is universally puerile during the attack. In the spasmodic form, the respiratory murmur is very feeble or absent during the fit; and in all forms percussion elicits a clear pulmonary sound. The disease generally consists in some source of irritation, and occasionally, perhaps, in paralysis of the pneumogastric nerves, Bronchoparal'ysis, Paral'ysis ner'vi va'gi in par'te thorac''ica, more frequently of the former—all the phenomena indicating constriction of the smaller bronchial ramifications. The treatment is one that relieves spasmodic action—anæsthetics, narcotics, counter-irritants, change of air, &c.

These symptoms are often accompanied by rigidity of the fingers and toes; the thumb being frequently drawn forcibly into the palm of the clenched hand, whence the name Car'po-pe'dal spasm, applied, at times, to the disease.

The pathology of the disease has been supposed to consist in an enlargement of the thymus gland, or of the glands of the neck pressing on the pneumogastric nerves [?]. The ear, by auscultation, at a distance from the chest, detects an incomplete, acute, hissing inspiration, or rather cry; whilst the expiration and voice are croupal, both at the accession and termination of the paroxysm. The heart's action has been observed to be distinct and feeble.

AUDIT''ION, (audire, auditum, 'to hear;') Audit''io, Audi'tus, A'coë, Acoë'sis, Acu'sis, (F.) Ouïe, Hearing. The act of hearing. The sensation arising from an impression made on the auditory nerves by the vibrations of the air, produced by a sonorous body. The physiology of Audition is obscure. It probably takes place:—1. By the vibrations being communicated from the membrana tympani along the chain of small bones to the membrane of the foramen ovale. 2. By means of the air in the cavity of the tympanum, the membrane of the foramen rotundum is agitated. 3. The transmission may be made by means of the bony parietes. In these three ways the vibrations produced by a sonorous body may reach the auditory nerve. Audition may be active or passive: hence the difference between listening and simply hearing.

AU'DITORY, Audito'rius, Auditi'vus, Acus'ticus, (F.) Auditif. That which relates to audition.

Auditory Ar'teries and Veins, are vessels which enter the auditory canals, and are, like them, distinguished into internal and external. The external auditory artery, A. Tympanique—(Ch.), is given off by the styloid, a branch of the external carotid: the internal is a branch of the basilary artery, which accompanies the auditory nerve, and is distributed to it. The Auditory Veins empty into the internal and external jugulars.

Auditory Canal', Extern'al, Mea'tus audito'rius exter'nus, Porus acus'ticus exter'nus, Alvea'rium, Sca'pha, Sca'phus, (F.) Conduit auditif externe, Conduit auriculaire, commences at the bottom of the concha, at the Fora'men auditi'vum exter'num, passes inwards, forwards, and a little downwards, and terminates at the membrana tympani. It is partly cartilaginous, partly osseous, and partly fibrous.

Auditory Canal, Intern'al, Mea'tus audito'rius inter'nus, Po'rus seu Si'nus acus'ticus, Cy'ar, (F.) Conduit auditif interne, C. labyrinthique, is situate on the posterior surface of the pars petrosa of the temporal bone. From the Fora'men auditi'vum inter'num, where it commences, it passes forwards and outwards, and terminates by a kind of cul-de-sac, mac'ula cribro'sa, perforated by many holes, one of which is the orifice of the Aquæductus Fallopii; and the others communicate with the labyrinth.

Auditory Nerve, Ner'vus audito'rius seu acus'ticus, Nerf labyrinthique—(Ch.), is the Por'tio Mol'lis of the seventh pair. It arises from the corpus restiforme, from the floor of the fourth ventricle, and by means of white striæ from the sides of the calamus scriptorius. As it leaves the encephalon, it forms a flattened cord, and proceeds with the facial nerve through the foramen auditivum internum, and as far as the bottom of the meatus, where it separates from the facial, and divides into two branches, one going to the cochlea, the coch'lear; the other to the vestibule and semi-circular canals, the vestib'ular.

AUGE, Al'veus. Some of the older anatomists gave this name to a reservoir, into which liquids flow in an interrupted manner, so that it is alternately full and empty. Such are the ventricles and auricles of the heart.

In Pathology, Aura means the sensation of a light vapour, which, in some diseases, appears to set out from the trunk or limbs; and to rise towards the head. This feeling has been found to precede attacks of epilepsy and hysteria, and hence it has been called Aur'a Epilep'tica, and A. hyster'ica.

They arise from the temporal artery and are distributed to the meatus auditorius externus, and to the pavilion of the ear. The posterior auricular is given off by the external carotid, from which it separates in the substance of the parotid gland. When it reaches the inferior part of the pavilion of the ear it bifurcates; one of its branches being distributed to the inner surface of the pavilion, the other passing over the mastoid process, and being distributed to the temporal and posterior auris muscles, &c. Before its bifurcation it gives off the stylo-mastoid artery. The Anterior and Posterior Auricular Veins open into the temporal and external jugular.

It ramifies and spreads over the two surfaces of the pavilion. 2. The auricular or superficial temporal, Temporal-cutaneous — (Ch.), is given off from the inferior maxillary. It ascends between the condyle of the jaw and the meatus auditorius externus, sends numerous filaments to the meatus and pavilion, and divides into two twigs, which accompany the branches of the temporal artery, and are distributed to the integuments of the head. There is also a posterior auricular furnished by the facial.

With us the noun is usually applied to the result of the application, or to the bandage itself;—a sense in which the French employ the word Bande. Bandages are simple or compound. The simple bandage is equal, if the turns are applied circularly above each other; unequal, if the turns are not accurately applied upon each other. If each turn of the bandage be only covered one-third, it forms the doloire of the French; if the edges touch only slightly, it is the mousse; if the turns are very oblique and separated, it is the spiral, or creeping, (F.) rampant; if folded upon each other, it is termed the reversed, (F.) renversé. By uniting various kinds of bandaging, we have the compound; and these compound bandages have received various names expressive of their figure, or of the parts to which they are applied, as capistrum, spica, &c. Bandages are divided, also, as regards their uses, into uniting, dividing, retaining, expelling, compressing, &c.

BLOOD, (Sax. bloꝺ, from bleꝺan, 'to bleed.') San'guis, Cru'or, La'pis anima'lis, Hæ'ma, (Old Eng.) Blede, (F.) Sang. An animal fluid formed chiefly from the chyle; acquiring important properties during respiration; entering every organ through the circulation; distributing the nutritive principles to every texture, and the source of every secretion. The blood is white in the molluscous and inferior animals, which have been, hence, called white-blooded, to distinguish them from the red-blooded, which class includes the mammalia, birds, reptiles, and fishes. Human blood is composed of water, albumen, fibrin, an animal colouring substance, a little fatty matter — hæmatele'um — and different salts; as chlorides of potassium and sodium, phosphate of lime, subcarbonate of soda, lime, magnesia, oxide of iron, and lactate of soda, united with an animal matter. Arterial blood is of a florid red colour, strong smell; s. g. 1.049. Venous blood is of a brownish red; s. g. 1.051. The difference in colour has given occasion to the first being called red blood; the latter, black. The former, which is distributed from the heart, is nearly the same through its whole extent: the latter is the remains of the arterial blood after the different elements have been taken from it in nutrition, with the addition of the products of absorption. Blood, taken from a vessel and left to itself, becomes solid, and separates into two distinct parts,—the serum or watery supernatant fluid; and the cruor, coag'ulum, crassamen'tum, hepar seu placen'ta san'guinis, placen'ta cruo'ris, in'sula, thrombus, or clot. The serum is chiefly water holding albumen in solution and the salts of the blood. The clot contains the fibrin, colouring matter—hæmatosin, a little serum, and a small quantity of salts. M. Le Canu found the blood to be composed—in 1000 parts—of water, 785.590; albumen, 69.415; fibrin, 3.565; colouring matter, 119.626; crystallizable fatty matter, 4.300; oily matter, 2.270; extractive matter soluble in alcohol and water, 1.920; albumen combined with soda, 2.010; chlorides of sodium and potassium; alkaline phosphates, sulphates, and subcarbonates, 7.304; subcarbonate of lime and magnesia, phosphate of lime, magnesia and iron, peroxide of iron, 1.414; loss, 2.586. The four principal components of the blood are fibrin, albumen, corpuscles, and saline matter. In the circulating blood they are thus combined—

Fibrin,
Albumen,
Salts,

Red and white Corpuscles, suspended in the Liquor Sanguinis.

In coagulated blood they are thus combined:

Fibrin,
Red and white Corpuscles,
Albumen,
Salts,
} Remaining in solution, forming serum.

The following table exhibits the computations of different physiologists regarding the weight of the circulating fluid—arterial and venous.

Harvey, Lister, Moulins, Abildguard, Blumenbach, Lobb, Lower, and Lewes,	lbs. 8 10
Sprengel	10 to 15
Günther and Bock	15 to 20
Blake	16¼ to 18¾
Weber and Lehmann	17½ to 19
Müller, Burdach, and P. Bérard	20
Wagner	20 to 25
Quesnai	27
F. Hoffmann	28
Haller	28 to 30
Young	40
Hamberger	80
Keill	100

The estimates of Günther, Bock, and Blake are probably approximations to the truth.

The proportion of arterial blood to venous is about 4 to 9.

Much attention has been paid to the varying condition of the blood in disease. The average proportion of each of the organic elements in 1000 parts of healthy blood is as follows, according to Le Canu, and MM. Andral and Gavarret: —fibrin, 3; red corpuscles, 127; solid matter of the serum, 80; water, 790.

Dried human blood was, at one time, considered to be anti-epileptic; that of the goat, dried, San'guis hir'ci sicca'tus, sudorific and antipleuretic. The dried blood of the ox—Extrac'tum San'guinis Bovi'ni—and the dried red corpuscles have been given as analeptics, especially where there was a deficiency of red corpuscles.

BLOODLETTING, Mis'sio seu Detrac'tio San'guinis, Hæmax'ie, Cataschas'mus, Blood'ing, Bleed'ing, Let'ting blood, (F.) Saignée, Émission sanguine. A discharge of a certain quantity of blood produced by art: an operation which consists in making an opening into a vessel to draw or let blood from it. When practiced on an artery, it is called Arteriot'omy; on a vein, Phlebot'omy, Venæsec'tio, Venesec'tion, Breath'ing a vein, and on the capillary vessels, lo'cal or capillary, in contradistinction to the former, which is termed gen'eral. Bloodletting is used both during the existence of a disease, as in inflammation, and in the way of prophylaxis. It is employed to fulfil various indications. 1 To diminish the actual mass of blood;—when it is termed, by the French pathologists, Saignée évacuative. In such case, fluids ought not to be allowed too freely afterwards. 2. To diminish the turgescence in any particular organ—(F.) Saignée révulsive, Revul'sive bloodletting or bleeding, Venæsec'tio revulso'ria, when performed far from the part affected; and Saignée dérivative, when near. 3. To diminish the corpuscles of the blood, (F.) Saignée spoliative, Spo'liative Phlebot'omy. The immediate effects of blood-letting are: diminution of the mass of blood and of heat; retardation of the pulse, and sometimes syncope. Blood letting from the veins—phlebotomy—is practised on the subcutaneous veins of the neck, the face, the fore-arm, and the leg; sometimes on those of the hand or foot. The necessary apparatus consists of a bandage or riband, a compress of rag, and a lancet or fleam.

The veins selected for the operation, are, 1. In the fold of the arm, five;—the cephalic, basilic, the two median, and the anterior cubital. 2. In the hand, the cephalic and salvatella. 3. In the foot, the great and little saphena. 4. In the neck, the external jugular. 5. In the forehead, the frontal. 6. In the mouth, the ranine. The operation of phlebotomy in the limbs is performed by tying a circular bandage round the limb, in order that the subcutaneous veins may become turgid by the course of the blood being obstructed: the bandage not being so tight, however, as to compress the arteries of the limb. A puncture is made into the vein, and the desired quantity allowed to flow. The ligature is now removed, and a compress and retaining bandage applied. Capillary or local bloodletting, arterio-phlebot'omy, is practised on the skin or mucous membranes, by means of leeches, the lancet, or cupping.

Until of late, this office was executed in England by two old women—called 'searchers'; and hence the imperfections of the Bills of Mortality. In plague times, the office was an important one; and, it is stated, that a noted searcher, named Snacks, finding his business increase so much, that he could not transact it alone, offered to any one who would join him in its hazards, half the profits; and they who joined him were said to "go with Snacks." Hence, the saying "to go Snacks," or to divide the spoils.

Bones are formed of two different textures; spong''y, Substan'tia spongio'sa; and compact', Substan'tia compac'ta. They afford, on analysis, much phosphate and carbonate of lime, a little phosphate of magnesia, phosphate of ammonia, oxide of iron and manganese, some traces of alumina and silica, gelatin, fat, and water. The uses of the bones are mentioned under each bone. They give shape to the body, contain and defend the viscera, and act as levers to the muscles.

It is met with chiefly in sea-water, and in many animal and vegetable bodies that live therein. It has likewise been found in many mineral waters of this and other countries. BRONCHI, Bronchia.

BRON'CHIA, pl. of bronchion, (βρογχια,) Bron'chiæ, Bron'chi. The Latins used the term Bronchus for the whole of the trachea; whilst they called its ramifications Bronchia. Bronchia, Bronchiæ, and Bronchi, (F.) Bronches, now mean the two tubes, with their ramifications, which arise from the bifurcation of the trachea, and carry air into the lungs — Can'nulæ pulmo'num, Syrin'ges seu Cana'les aërif'eri.

BRONCHIA, DILATA'TION OF THE, Dila'ted Bron'chia, Bronchec'tasis, Bronchiec'tasis, Dilata'tio bronchio'rum. The physical signs of this condition are the following: Percussion usually clear, but not unfrequently less so than natural, although very seldom quite dull. Auscultation detects coarse mucous or gurgling rhonchi, increased by the cough, combined with, or replaced by, bronchial or cavernous respiration, which is often effected as if by a sudden puff or whiff. The resonance of the voice is increased, but it seldom amounts to perfect pectoriloquy. The most common situations for dilated bronchia are the scapular, mammary, and lateral regions. They are almost always confined to one side.

BRONCHIA, OBLITERA'TION OR COMPRES'SION OF THE. The inspiratory murmur on auscultation is weaker or wholly suppressed over a limited portion of the chest; the expiration is generally more distinct and prolonged: all the other conditions are natural.

BRONCHIÆ, see Bronchia.

BRONCHIAL CELLS, see Cellules, bronchic, and Pulmo.

BRONCHIAL COUGH, (F.) Toux bronchique, T. tubaire. This generally accompanies bronchial respiration. Both indicate obstruction to the entrance of air into the air-cells.

BRONCHIAL GLANDS, Broncha'denes, Glan'dulæ Vesalia'næ, Glands of Vesa'lius, (F.) Glandes bronchiques, Ganglions lymphatiques des bronches, are numerous glands of an ovoid shape; of a reddish hue in the infant, and subsequently brown and black, seated in the course of the bronchia. Their functions are unknown. The bronchial glands may be presumed to be affected by scrofulosis, when, in addition to the existence of tumours in the neck, percussion gives a dull sound under the upper and central part of the sternum, whilst there is no appreciable lesion of the lungs.

BRONCHIAL NERVES, (F.) Nerfs bronchiques, are furnished by the two pulmonary plexuses.

Inflammation of the lining membrane of the bronchial tubes. This is always more or less present in cases of pulmonary catarrh; and is accompanied by cough, mucous expectoration, dyspnœa, and more or less uneasiness in breathing. The acute form is accompanied with all the signs of internal inflammation, and requires the employment of antiphlogistics followed by revulsives. The chronic form, Tus'sis seni'lis, Catar'rhus seni'lis, Rheu'ma catarrhu'lē, Peripneumo'nia no'tha, Bronchorrhœ'a acu'ta, Win'ter Cough, Chron'ic Catarrh', may be confounded with phthisis; from which it must be distinguished mainly by the absence of hectic fever and of the physical signs that are characteristic of the latter, as well as by the nature of the expectoration, which is generally mucous, although at times muco-purulent. When the expectoration is little or none, the bronchitis is said to be dry; dry catarrh, (F.) Catarrhe Sec; when fetid, the disease is termed fet'id bronchitis.

When bronchitis affects the smaller tubes, it is termed cap'illary bronchi'tis, bronchi'tis capilla'ris, bronchoc'acē infanti'lis [?], and is often fatal to children.* Vesic'ular bronchitis is used by MM. Rilliet and Barthez for the vesicular pneumonia of children.

This is no rupture, but consists of an enlargement of the thyroid gland. It is common at the base of lofty mountains in every part of the world; and has been supposed to be owing to the drinking of snow-water, but it occurs where there is no snow. The tumour is sometimes very extensive. Iodine has great power over it, and will generally occasion its absorption, when the case has not been of such duration as to have ended in a cartilaginous condition. Shakspeare describes the tumors as 'wallets of flesh.'—Gonzalo, in Tempest, Act III. Scene 3.

It indicates contraction of the valvular orifices by cartilaginous deposits, or ossification, and is better heard near the apex of the heart, if the auriculo-ventricular valves are concerned,—near the base, if the semilunar valves are the seat of the disease.

A sound like that of a bellows, heard occasionally by the ear applied to the chest during the contraction of the ventricles, auricles, or large arteries. It coexists with affections of the heart, but is heard, also, without any disease of that organ,—whenever, indeed, an artery is compressed. An Encephal'ic bellows' sound, (F.) Bruit de souffle céphalique, has been described by Drs. Fisher and Whitney. It is heard on applying the ear to the occiput or to the top of the head; and is considered to indicate turgescence of vessels, or inflammation. When such turgescence exists, the vessels are compressed, and the compression gives rise to the sound in question.

BRUIT DE SOUPAPE, ('valvular or flapping sound.') A sound heard in respiration, when a foreign body is in the air passages. It somewhat resembles the flapping of a valve; hence its French name.

BRUIT DE TAFFETAS, ('sound of taffeta, sarcenet sound.') A respiratory sound, so named, by M. Grisolle, from its resembling the sound caused by the tearing of a piece of taffeta; and which he considers to indicate hepatization of the lung, limited to the surface, in pneumonia.

CALCULI, pl. of Calculus, (dim. of calx, 'a stone.') Lithi, Lap'ides, (F.) Calculs, Pierres. Calculi are concretions which may form in every part of the animal body, but are most frequently found in the organs that act as reservoirs, and in the excretory canals. They are met with in the tonsils, joints, biliary ducts, digestive passages, lachrymal ducts, mammæ, pancreas, pineal gland, prostate, lungs, salivary, spermatic and urinary passages, and in the uterus. The causes which give rise to them are obscure.

Those that occur in reservoirs or ducts are supposed to be owing to the deposition of the substances, which compose them, from the fluid as it passes along the duct; and those which occur in the substance of an organ are regarded as the product of some nutritive irritation. Their general effect is to irritate, as extraneous bodies, the parts with which they are in contact; and to produce retention of the fluid, whence they have been formed. The symptoms differ, according to the sensibility of the organ and the importance of the particular secretion whose discharge they impede. Their solution is generally impracticable: spontaneous expulsion or extraction is the only way of getting rid of them.

Calculi Alternating, see Calculi, urinary—c. Articular, see Calculi, arthritic, and Concretions, articular.

Calculi Arthrit'ic, To'phi, Tuber'cula arthrit'ica, Calculi arthrit'ici seu podag'rici, Chalkstones, Gout-stones, Nodes, (F.) Pierres crayeuses, Calculs arthritiques, Nœuds. Concretions, which form in the ligaments, and within the capsules of the joints, in persons affected with gout. They are composed of uric acid, soda, and a little animal matter; very rarely, urate of lime and chloride of sodium are met with. Similar calculi are found in other parts besides the joints.

Cal'culi, Bil'iary, Calculi bilio'si seu fel'lei seu bilia'rii, Cholol'ithus, Cholel'ithus, Bil'iary Concre'tions, Gall-stones, (F.) Calculs biliaires, Pierres au fiel, Angiochololithe of Piorry. Some of these contain all the materials of the bile, and seem to be nothing more than that secretion thickened. The greater part are composed of from 88 to 94 parts of Cholesterin, and of from 6 to 12 of the yellow matter of the bile. Biliary calculi are most frequently found in the gall-bladder: at other times, in the substance of the liver, in the branches of the Ductus hepaticus, or in the Ductus Communis Choledochus. The first are called Cystic; the second Hepatic: and the last, sometimes, Hepatocystic. The causes which give rise to them are very obscure. When quiescent they often occasion no uneasiness. At times, they are rejected by the mouth, or by the bowels, along with a considerable quantity of bile, which had accumulated behind them; at other times they occasion violent abdominal inflammation, abscesses, and biliary fistulæ, rupture of the gall-bladder, and fatal effusion into the peritoneum. The passage of a gall-stone is extremely painful; yet the pulse is not at first affected. Antiphlogistics, when there is inflammatory action, and anæsthetics, and strong doses of opium, to allay the pain and spasm, with the warm bath, are the chief remedies. Solvents are not to be depended upon. They cannot reach the calculi.

Calculi, Bone Earth, see Calculi, urinary — c. Compound, see Calculi, urinary—c. Cystic, see Calculi, urinary.

Calculi of the Ears, (F.) Calculs de l'Oreille. Hard, light, and inflammable concretions, which occur in the meatus auditorius externus, and are merely indurated cerumen. They are a frequent cause of deafness. They can be easily seen, and may be extracted by appropriate forceps, after having been softened by injections of soap and water.

Calculi Fellei, Calculi, biliary — c. Fusible, see Calculi, urinary.

Calculi, Lach'rymal, (F.) Calculs lacrymaux. Concretions sometimes, but rarely, form in the lachrymal passages, where they occasion abscess and fistulæ, which do not heal until they are extracted.

Calculi, Lithic, see Calculi, urinary.

Calculi of the Mam'mæ, (F.) Calculs des Mamelles. Haller gives a case of a concretion, of a yellowish white colour, which had the shape of one of the excretory ducts of the mammary gland, having been extracted from an abscess seated in that organ.

Calculi, Mulberry, see Calculi, urinary.

Calculi of the Pan'creas, (F.) Calculs du Pancréas. These are but little known. Analogy has induced a belief that they resemble the salivary. Some have supposed that certain transparent calculi, rejected by vomiting, or passed in the evacuations, have proceeded from the pancreas, but there seems to be no sufficient reason for this belief.

Calculi of the Pin'eal Gland, (F.) Calculs de la Glande Pinéale. Sabulous concretion are usual in the gland. No phenomena announce their presence during life. They are composed of phosphate of lime.

Calculi Podagrici. Calculi, arthritic.

Calculi of the Pros'tate, Prostat'ic cal'culi. These are not very rare. They have generally the same composition as the preceding. They usually present the symptoms common to every tumefaction of the prostate, and sometimes those of calculi in the bladder.

Calculi Pul'monary, (F.) Calculs pulmonaires. These concretions are very frequently met with in the dead body, without seeming to have produced unpleasant symptoms during life. At other times, they are accompanied with all the symptoms of phthisis, Lithophthi'sis, Phthisie calculeuse, of Bayle. See Lithiasis pulmonum. At times they are expectorated without the supervention of any unpleasant symptom. They are usually formed mainly of carbonate of lime and animal matter.

Calculi, Sal'ivary, Calculi Saliva'les, Sialol'ithi, (F.) Calculs salivaires. Concretions, usually formed of phosphate and carbonate of lime and animal matter, which are developed in the substsnce of the salivary glands or in their excretory ducts. In the first case, they may be mistaken for a simple swelling of the gland; in the second, they may generally be detected by the touch. They may be extracted by incision in the interior of the mouth. The calculus developed in the sublingual ducts has been called Cal'culus sublingua'lis and Ran'ula lapide'a.

Calculi, Spermat'ic, (F.) Calculs spermatiques. These have been sometimes found in the vesiculæ seminales after death. They cannot be detected during life.

Calculi of the Stom'ach and Intes'tines, Enterol'ithus, E. Calculus, Coprol'ithus, Concretio'nes alvi'næ, (F.) Calculs de l'estomac, C. intestinaux ou stercoraux, Pierres stercorales, Concrétions intestinales. Calculi of the stomach are rare, and have almost always been carried thither by the antiperistaltic action of the intestines. The symptoms occasioned by them are those of chronic gastritis. It has been imagined that the continued use of absorbent powders, as magnesia, will give occasion to them.

Intestinal concretions, (F.) Calculs intestinaux, are not uncommon in animals (see Bezoard): but they are rare in man. The causes which give rise to them are little known: sometimes a biliary calculus affords them a nucleus. Their composition varies. They are light, hard, very fetid, and are formed, ordinarily, between the valvulæ of the small intestines, or in the cells of the large, and sometimes in old herniæ. Whilst they do not obstruct the passage of the alimentary mass, they produce no unpleasant symptoms. At times, the movable tumour which they form may be felt through the parietes of the abdomen. They are generally evacuated per anum.

Calculi of the Ton'sils. Calculous concretions, which sometimes form in the tonsils. (F.) Calculs des Amygdales. They are easily recognised by the sight and touch: sometimes they are discharged by spitting, either alone or with the pus of an abscess occasióned by their presence.

CALCULI, TRIPLE, see Calculi, urinary—c. Uric, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI, U'RINARY, Urol'ithi, (F.) Calculs urinaires, Pierres urinaires. Concretions which form from the crystallizable substances in the urine, and are met with not only in the whole course of the urinary passages, but in fistulous openings wherever the urine stagnates naturally or accidentally. Their causes are but little known. They are more common at the two extremities of life than at the middle, and more so in some countries and districts than in others. At times, a clot of blood, a portion of mucus, &c., form the nucleus. The symptoms and treatment vary according to the seat of the calculus. There is no such thing, probably, as a medical solvent. See Urinary Calculi.

Chymists have demonstrated the existence of several components of urinary calculi, viz., Lithic Acid and lithates, Phosphate of Lime, Ammoniaco-Magnesian Phosphate, Oxalate of Lime, Cystic Oxide, and Xanthic Oxide, with an animal cementing ingredient. The varieties of calculi, produced by the combination or intermixture of these ingredients, were thus represented by Dr. Paris.

A TABULAR VIEW OF DIFFERENT SPECIES OF URINARY CALCULI.

SPECIES OF CALCULI.	EXTERNAL CHARACTERS.	CHYMICAL COMPOSITION.	REMARKS.
1. LITHIC OR URIC.	FORM, a flattened oval. S. G. generally exceeds 1.500. Colour, brownish or fawn-like. Surface, smooth. Texture, laminated.	It consists principally of Lithic Acid. When treated with nitric acid, a beautiful pink substance results. This calculus is slightly soluble in water, abundantly so in the pure alkalies.	It is the prevailing species; but the surface sometimes occurs finely tuberculated. It frequently constitutes the nuclei of the other species.
2. MULBERRY, (F.) Calculs muraux.	Colour, dark brown. Texture, harder than that of the other species. S. G. from 1.428 to 1.976. Surface, studded with tubercles.	It is oxalate of lime, and is decomposed in the flame of a spirit lamp swelling out into a white efflorescence, which is quicklime.	This species includes some varieties, which are remarkably smooth and pale-coloured, resembling hempseed.
3. BONE EARTH.	Colour, pale brown or gray; surface, smooth and polished; structure, regularly laminated; the laminæ easily separating into concrete crusts.	Principally phosphate of lime. It is soluble in muriatic acid.
4. TRIPLE.	Colour, generally brilliant white. Surface, uneven, studded with shining crystals, less compact than the preceding species. Between its laminæ small cells occur, filled with sparkling particles.	It is an ammoniaco-magnesian phosphate, generally mixed with phosphate of lime. Pure alkalies decompose it, extracting its ammonia.	This species attains a larger size than any of the others.
5. FUSIBLE.	Colour, grayish white.	A compound of the two foregoing species.	It is very fusible, melting into a vitreous globule.
6. CYSTIC.	Very like the triple calculus, but it is unstratified and more compact and homogeneous.	It consists of cystic oxide. Under the blowpipe it yields a peculiarly fetid odour. It is soluble in acids, and in alkalies, even if they are fully saturated with carbonic acid.	It is a rare species.
7. ALTERNATING.	Its section exhibits different concentric laminæ.	Compounded of several species, alternating with each other.
8. COMPOUND.	No characteristic form.	The ingredients are separable only by chymical analysis.

1. Renal Calculi, (F.) Calculs rénaux. These have almost always a very irregular shape: at times, there is no indication of their presence: at others, they occasion attacks of pain in the kidneys, sometimes accompanied by bloody or turbid urine. Often, they cause inflammation of the kidneys, with all its unpleasant results. They are generally formed of uric acid, or oxalate of lime, and at times, phosphates with animal matter. The treatment will have to vary, according to the presumed constituents and to the absence or presence of inflammatory signs,—relieving the irritation by opiates. A surgical operation can rarely be applicable.

2. Calculi of the Ure'ters, (F.) Calculs des Urétères. These come from the kidneys, and do not produce unpleasant effects, unless they are so large as to obstruct the course of the urine, and to occasion distension of the whole of the ureters above them; or unless their surface is so rough as to irritate the mucous membrane, and occasion pain, hemorrhage, abscesses, &c. The pain, during the passage, is very violent, extending, at times, to the testicles of the same side in the male; and occasioning a numbness of the thigh in both sexes. The treatment consists in general or local blood-letting, warm bath, and opiates.

3. Ves'ical Calculi; Stone in the Bladder, Lith'ia vesica'lis, Lithi'asis cys'tica seu vesica'lis, Cystolithi'asis, Dysu'ria calculo'sa seu irrita'ta, Cal'culus vesi'cæ. (F.) Calculs vésicaux. These are the most common. Sometimes, they proceed from the kidneys: most commonly, they are formed in the bladder itself. Sense of weight in the perinæum, and sometimes of a body rolling when the patient changes his position; pain or itching at the extremity of the glans in men; frequent desire to pass the urine; sudden stoppage to its flow; and bloody urine—are the chief phenomena, that induce a suspicion of their existence. We cannot, however, be certain of this without sounding the patient. Sometimes, when of a small size, they are expelled: most commonly, they remain in the bladder, the disorganization of which they occasion, unless removed by a surgical operation.

4. Ure'thral Calculi. These almost always proceed from the bladder. The obstruction, which they cause to the passage of the urine, the hard tumour, and the noise occasioned when struck by a sound, indicate their presence. They are removed by incision. They form, at times, in the prostate gland, Prostatol'ithi.

CAN'CELLATED, Cancella'tus, (F.) Cancellé; (cancelli, 'lattice-work.') Formed of cancelli,—as the 'cancellated structure of bone.'

The Cellular or Spongy Texture of Bones, (F.) Tissu celluleux; consisting of numerous cells, communicating with each other. They contain a fatty matter, analogous to marrow. This texture is met with, principally, at the extremities of long bones; and some of the short bones consist almost wholly of it. It allows of the expansion of the extremities of bones, without adding to their weight, and deadens concussions.

CANCEL'LUS, (dim. of cancer, 'a crab.') A species of crayfish, called the Wrong Heir, and Ber'nard the Her'mit: which is said to cure rheumatism, if rubbed on the part.

CAN'CER, gen. Cancri, 'a crab.' Car'cinus, Lu'pus Cancro'sus. A discase, so called either on account of the hideous appearance which the ulcerated cancer presents, or on account of the great veins which surround it, and which the ancients compared to the claws of the crab: called also Carcino'ma. It generally consists of a scirrhous, livid tumour, intersected by firm, whitish, divergent bands; and occurs chiefly in the secernent glands. The pains are acute and lancinating, and often extend to other parts. The tumour, ultimately, terminates in a fetid and ichorous ulcer, — Ul'cus cancro'sum. It is distinguished, according to its stages, into occult, Can'cer occul'tus, and o'pen, C. aper'tus; the former being the scirrhous, the latter the ulcerated condition. At times, there is a simple destruction or erosion of the organ, at others, an enceph'aloid or cer'ebriform, and at others, again, a colloid degeneration.

For its production, it requires a peculiar diathesis, or cachexia. The following table, from

Encephaloid.	Scirrhus.	Colloid.
Resembles lobulated cerebral matter.	Resembles rind of bacon traversed by cellulo-fibrous septa.	Has the appearance of particles of jelly inlaid in a regular alveolar bed.
Is commonly opake from its earliest formation.	Has a semi-transparent glossiness.	The contained matter is strikingly trasparent.
Is of a dead white colour.	Has a clear whitish or bluish yellow tint.	Greenish yellow is its predominant hue.
Contains a multitude of minute vessels.	Is comparatively ill-supplied with vessels.	Its vessels have not been sufficiently examined as yet.
Is less hard and dense than scirrhus.	Is exceedingly firm and dense.	The jelly-like matter is exceedingly soft; a colloid mass is, however, firm and resisting.
Is frequently found in the veins issuing from the diseased mass.	Has not been distinctly detected in this situation.	The pultaceous variety has been detected in the veins.
The predominant microscopical elements are globular, not always distinctly cellular, and caudate corpuscula.	The main microscopical constituents are juxtaposed nuclear cells; caudate corpuscula do not exist in it.	Is composed of shells in a state of emboîtement.
Occasionally attains an enormous bulk.	Rarely acquires larger dimensions than an orange.	Observes a mean in this respect.
Has been observed in almost every tissue of the body.	Its seat, as ascertained by observation, is somewhat more limited.	Has so far been seen in a limited number of parts only.
Very commonly co-exists in several parts or organs of the same subject.	Is not unusually solitary.	Has rarely been met with in more than one organ.
Is remarkable for its occasional vast rapidity of growth.	Ordinarily grows slowly.	Grows with a medium degree of rapidity.
Is frequently the seat of interstitial hemorrhage and deposition of black or bistre-coloured matter.	Is comparatively rarely the seat of these changes.
When softened into a pulp, appears as a dead white or pink opake matter of creamy consistence.	Resembles, when softened, a yellowish brown semitransparent gelatinous matter.	Undergoes no visible change of the kind.
Subcutaneous tumours are slow to contract adhesion with the skin.	Scirrhus thus situate usually becomes adherent.
Ulcerated encephaloid is frequently the seat of hemorrhage, followed by rapid fungous development.	Scirrhous ulcers much less frequently give rise to hemorrhage; and fungous growths (provided they retain the scirrhous character) are now more slowly and less abundantly developed.
The progress of the disease after ulceration is commonly very rapid.	There is no such a remarkable change in the rate of progress of the disease after ulceration has set in.
It is the most common form under which secondary cancer exhibits itself.
Is the species of cancer most frequently observed in young subjects.	Is much less common before puberty.	Has so far been observed in adults only.

Dr. Walshe, exhibits the characters of the three great species of cancer.

The use of irritants in cancerous affections is strongly to be deprecated. When the disease is so situate that excision can be practised, and the constitution does not exhibit great contamination, the sooner it is removed the better. See Carcinoma, and Thnétoblaste.

It is, however, rare in the last-named country. It is found on species of Oleaceæ—as the ash, privet, and lilac; and of Caprifoliaceæ—as the elder and lonicera. It is much employed in medicine, and is the most common vesicatory. Given internally, and even when absorbed from the skin, it affects the urinary organs, exciting strangury. This may be prevented, in cases of blisters, by interposing between the blistering plaster and skin a piece of tissue paper. Diluents relieve the strangury. Dose, half a grain to one grain. If kept dry, the flies will retain their activity for many years. Their active principle—Can'tharidin, Cantharidi'na—has been separated from them.

Can'tharis vesicato'ria is the ordinary blistering insect used in Europe.

Cardiac Ar'teries, Cor'onary arteries, (F.) Artères cardiaques ou coronaires, are two in number. They arise from the aorta, a little above the free edge of the sigmoid valves, and are distributed on both surfaces of the heart.

Cardiac Gan'glion, Gan'glion cardi'acum, situated beneath the arch of the aorta, to the right side of the ligament of the ductus arteriosus. It receives the superior cardiac nerves of opposite sides of the neck, and a branch from the pneumogastric, and gives off numerous branches to the cardiac plexuses.

Cardiac Nerves, (F.) Nerfs cardiaques. These are commonly three on each side; a superior, middle, and inferior, which are furnished by corresponding cervical ganglia. Commonly, there are but two on the left side; the upper and middle, which draw their origin from the last two cervical ganglia. It is formed by the convergence of the middle and inferior cardiac nerves; and by branches from the pneumogastric, descendens noni, and first thoracic ganglion. 2. The anterior cardiac plexus is situated in front of the ascending aorta near its origin. It is formed by filaments from the superior cardiac nerves; from the cardiac ganglion; and from the great cardiac plexus. Filaments from this plexus accompany the left coronary artery, and form the anterior coronary plexus. 3. The posterior cardiac plexus is seated upon the posterior part of the ascending aorta near its origin. It is formed by numerous branches from the great cardiac plexus. It divides into two sets of branches, which together constitute the posterior coronary plexus.

Cardiac Veins, Cor'onary veins, (F.) Veines Cardiaques, are commonly four in number; two anterior and two posterior. Among the former—venæ innomina'tæ of Vieussens—there is one running along the right border of the heart, which has been called the vein of Galen. The cardiac veins open into the right auricle by one orifice, which is furnished with a valve, and is called, by Portal, Sinus coronaire du Cœur.

The disease commonly occurs between the third and ninth month, and is characterized by excessive dyspnœa, accompanied by a loud croupy noise on inspiration; the thumbs being locked, and the hands and feet rigidly bent for a longer or shorter period. The seat of the disease is evidently in the cerebro-spinal axis, primarily or secondarily: generally, perhaps, it is owing to erethism seated elsewhere, but communicated to the cerebro-spinal centre, and reflected to the respiratory and other muscles concerned. It seems to be connected with dental irritation; and consequently, in the treatment, where such is the case, the gums should be freely divided; after which, cathartics and revulsives, with the use of narcotics and appropriate diet, will generally remove the affection; for although extremely alarming, it is often not attended with great danger. See Asthma thymicum.

CAT'ARACT, Cataruc'ta, Catarrhac'ta, Suffu'sio Oc'uli, S. Len'tis crystal'linæ, Phthar'ma cataract'ta, Cali'go len'tis, Gut'ta opa'ca, Hypoch'yma, Hopoch'ysis, Hypoph'ysis, Phacoscoto'ma, Parop'sis cataruc'ta, Glauco'ma Woulhou'si, (F.) Cataracte, (καταβακτης, from καταβασσειν, (cata and βασσειν,) 'to tumble down.') A deprivation of sight, which comes on as if a veil fell before the eyes. Cataract consists in opacity of the crystalline lens or its capsule, which prevents the passage of the rays of light, and precludes vision. The causes are obscure. Diagnosis.—The patient is blind, the pupil seems closed by an opake body, of variable colour, but commonly whitish:—the pupil contracting and dilating. Cataracts have been divided, by some, into spu'rious and gen'uine. The former, Pseudocataruc'ta, where the obstacle to vision is between the capsule of the lens and the uvea: the latter, where it is in the lens or capsule.

A lentic'ular cat'aract is where the affection is seated in the lens:—a cap'sular or mem'branous, in the capsule. The capsular is divided again, by Beer, into the anterior, posterior, and complete capsular cataract. When the capsule is rendered opake, in consequence of an injury, which cuts or ruptures any part of it, it thickens, becomes leathery, and has been called Cataruc'ta ar'ida siliquo'sa. Cataruc'ta Morgagnia'na lac'tea seu purifor'mis is the milk'y variety, in which the crystalline is transformed into a liquid similar to milk, (F.) Cataracte laiteuse; or, as generally defined, in which there is opacity of the fluid situate between the lens and its capsule. The cap'sulolentic'ular affects both lens and capsule, (Achrystallodiaphanie, Adiaphanie périchrystaltique of Piorry,) and Beer conceives the liquor Morgagni, in an altered state, may contribute to it. Cataracts are also called hard (Sclerocataruc'ta), soft (Phacomala'cia), sto'ny (F. pierreuse), milk'y or chee'sy (laiteuse ou caséuse), Galactocataruc'ta, Cataruc'ta lactic'olor, according to their density:—white, pearly, yellow, brown, gray, green, black, (F.) blanche, perlée, jaune, brune, grise, verte, noire, according to their colour:—fix'ed or vac'illating—cataruc'ta capsulolenticula'ris fix'a vel trem'ula, (F.) fixe ou branlante, according as they are fixed or movable behind the pupil. They are likewise called Cataruc'tæ marmora'ciæ, fenestra'tæ, stella'tæ, puncta'tæ, dimidia'tæ, &c., according to the appearances they present.

They may be sim'ple or com'plicated with adhesion, amaurosis, specks, &c.; and pri'mary or prim'itive, when opake before the operation;—sec'ondary, when the opacity is the result of the operation.

Cataract is commonly a disease of elderly individuals, although, not unfrequently, congen'ital. It forms slowly; objects are at first seen as through a mist; light bodies appear to fly before the eyes, and it may not be until after months or years that the sight is wholly lost. No means will obviate the evil except an operation, which consists in removing the obstacle to the passage of the light to the retina. Four chief methods are employed for this purpose. 1. Couch'ing or Depres'sion, Hyalonix'is, Hyalonyx'is, Crystallocatapic'sis, Crystallocatath'esis, (F.) Abaissement ou Déplacement de la Cataracte. This consists in passing a cataract needle through the sclerotica and subjacent membranes, a little above the transverse diameter of the eye; and at about two lines' distance from the circumference of the transparent cornea, until the point arrives in the posterior chamber of the eye. With this the crystalline is depressed to the outer and lower part of the globe of the eye, where it is left. 2. By absorption,—by the French termed broiement or bruising. This is performed in the same manner as the former; except that, instead of turning the crystalline from the axis of the visual rays, it is divided by the cutting edge of the needle, and its fragments are scattered in the humours of the eye, where they are absorbed. 3. By extraction, which consists in opening, with a particular kind of knife, the transparent cornea and the anterior portion of the capsule of the crystalline; and causing the lens to issue through the aperture. Each of the processes has its advantages and disadvantages, and all are used by surgeons. 4. Some, again, pass a cataract needle through the transparent cornea and pupil to the crystalline, and depress or cause its absorption. This is called Ceratonyxis. See, also, Reclination.

A discharge of fluid from a mucous membrane. The ancients considered catarrh as a simple flux, and not as an inflammation. Generally it partakes of this character, however. Catarrh is, with us, usually restricted to inflammation of the mucous membrane of the air-passages: the French extend it to that of all mucous membranes; (F.) Flux muqueux, Fluxion catarrhale.

It is commonly an affection of but little consequence, but apt to relapse and become chronic. It is characterized by cough, thirst, lassitude, fever, watery eyes, with increased secretion of mucus from the air-passages. The antiphlogistic regimen and time usually remove it. Sometimes, the inflammation of the bronchial tubes is so great as to prove fatal.

CAVERNOUS BOD'IES, Cor'pora Caverno'sa of the penis, Cor'pora Nervo'sa seu Ner'vospongio'sa Pe'nis, (F.) Corps Caverneux. The corpus cavernosum is a kind of cylindrical sac, composed of cells; separated, through its whole extent, by a vertical, incomplete septum, Sep'tum pectinifor'mē, Trabec'ulæ cor'porum cavernoso'rum, and forming nearly two-thirds of the penis. The corpus cavernosum, on each side, arises from the ascending portion of the ischium, and terminates obtusely behind the glans. The arteries of the corpora cavernosa come from the internal pudic. See Helicine Arteries. Nerves are found on the surface of the outer membrane, but they do not appear to penetrate the substance, and the smooth muscular fibre has been traced into the fibrous parietes of the cells, as in the case of all erectile tissues.

J. Müller's researches have led him to infer, that both in man and the horse, the nerves of the corpora cavernosa are made up of branches proceeding from the organic as well as the animal system, whilst the nerves of animal life alone provide the nerves of sensation of the penis.

It serves to contract the entrance to the vagina during coition. See Bulbus vestibuli.

CAVERNOUS RESPIRA'TION. When a cavity exists in the lungs, and one or more ramifications of the bronchia terminate in it, a loud tubal noise is emitted, provided the cavity be not filled with fluid, which is called cavernous respiration. In this condition, the cough likewise is cavernous, (F.) Toux Caverneuse. When the capacity of the cavern is very great, the sound of the respiration is like that produced by blowing into a decanter, with the mouth at a little distance from the neck. This kind of cavernous respiration has been called amphor'ic, from am'phora, 'a flask;' (F.) Respiration amphorique, Souffle amphorique, S. métallique.

The Veiled Puff, (F.) Souffle voilé, is a modification of the cavernous respiration, in which, according to Laënnec, "a sort of movable veil interposed between the excavation and the ear" seems to be agitated to and fro. It is a sign which is not much attended to.

They commence behind the inner part of the sphenoid fissure, pass backwards on the sides of the fossa pituitaria, and terminate by opening into a cavity, common to the superior and inferior petrosal sinuses. They receive some meningeal veins, the ophthalmic veins, &c. The anterior extremity of each cavernous sinus has been named the ophthal'mic sinus.

CAVERNOUS TEX'TURE OR TIS'SUE, Te'la caverno'sa, (F.) Tissu Caverneux. The spongy substance which forms the greater part of the penis and clitoris. It seems to consist of a very complicated lace-work of arteries and veins; and, probably, of nervous filaments, with small fibrous plates, which form by their decussation numerous cells communicating with each other. This spongy texture produces erection, by dilating and swelling on the influx of blood; and probably, also, by virtue of some property inherent in it.

It contains irregular areolæ—not cells, and, therefore, more properly called are'olar tissue—between the fibres, as well as serum, fat, and the adipous tissue. Of the fibres, some are of the yellow elastic kind; but the greater part are of the white fibrous tissue, and they frequently present the form of broad flat bands, in which no distinct fibrous arrangement is perceptible. See, also, Princeps Cervicis (arteria).

CERVICAL GAN'GLIONS. The three ganglions of the great sympathetic. The cervical glands or lymphatic glands of the neck are, also, so called. See Trisplanchnic nerve.

CERVICAL LIG'AMENTS. These are two in number. 1. The ante'rior, extending from the basilary process of the occipital bone to the anterior part of the first cervical vertebra. 2. The poste'rior or supraspi'nous, Ligamen'tum Nu'chæ, which extends from the outer occipital protuberance to the spinous process of the seventh cervical vertebra. In animals with large heads it is very strong. See Nucha.

The side of the neck is divided into two large triangles by the sternomastoid muscle—the anterior triangle or triangular space, and the posterior triangle or triangular space, which are interesting in their surgical relations. 1. The anterior triangular space is divided into three smaller triangles by the digastric muscle above, and by the anterior belly of the omo-hyoid below. These are named, from below upwards, the inferior carotid triangle, the superior carotid, and the submaxillary. 2. The posterior triangle or triangular space is crossed by the posterior belly of the omo-hyoid, which divides it into two triangles,—an upper or occipital, and a lower or subclavian.

They consist of two springs, one thermal, the other cold. The hot spring is clear, inodorous, and contains soda and carbonic acid. The cold spring contains iron and sulphate of soda. Cauquenes is much resorted to by invalids during the summer. Mineral waters are very common in Chili. Those of Apoquinde, Colina, and Cauquenes, have been analyzed by Prof. J. Lawrence Smith, M. D.

A cutaneous affection, characterized by one or more broad, irregular-shaped patches, of a yellow or yellowish-brown colour, occurring most frequently on the front of the neck, breast, abdomen, and groins. The patches do not generally rise above the surface. There is usually some degree of itching. A cryptogamous growth has been found in it, to which M. Robin gives the name Micros'poron fur'fur.

The causes are not very evident. Sulphur externally—in any and every form—generally removes it speedily. Should there be difficulty, the external use of the remedy in baths or fumigations may succeed.

It is a greenish, yellow gas, of a strong suffocating smell, and disagreeable taste; incapable of maintaining combustion and respiration, and very soluble in water. One of its characteristics is, that of destroying, almost immediately, all vegetable and animal colours. It is employed in fumigations as a powerful disinfecting agent. A dilute solution, A'qua seu Li'quor Chlo'rini, Chlorin'ii Li'quor, Chlorin'ei aqua, Aqua Chlorin'ii (Ph. U. S., 1863), Liquor Chlo'ri, Chlo'rine water, Solu'tion of Chlo'rine, (F.) Chlore liquide, has been administered internally, in certain cases of diarrhœa and chronic dysentery. A formula for its preparation, by disengaging chlorine from black oxide of manganese, by means of muriatic acid ; and causing it to pass into water, has been admitted into the Pharmacopœia of the United States for 1863.

Immersion of the hands and arms in chlorine has often removed itch and other cutaneous affections. It has also been inhaled in a dilute state in the early stage of phthisis, but it is of doubtful efficacy, and is better adapted for chronic bronchitis.

CHLORINE, BISULPHURET OF, Sulphur, chloride of.

CHLOROÂNÆMIA, (χλωρος, 'green,' and anæmia.) Chlorosis.

CHLO'RODYNE. A secret preparation, proposed, in 1848, by a Dr. Browne of India; and said, by him, to consist of "perchloric acid with a new alkaloid." It has been given as an anodyne chiefly; but being a nostrum, is only worthy of mention for its notoriety.

CHLO'ROFORM, Chloroform'um, Chloroform'ium, (from chlorine, and formyl.,) Carbo'neum seu For'mylum chlora'tum, Superchlo'ridum formyl'icum, Perchlo'ride and Terchlo'ride of For'myl, Chloroform'yl, called also, but not correctly, Terchlo'ride of Car'bon, and Chlo'ric e'ther, Æ'ther chlo'ricus ; — (F.) Chloroforme, Chloréthéride, is a colourless, oleaginous liquid, of a sweetish ethereal odour, hot, aromatic, and peculiar taste. The specific gravity of that of the Ph. U. S., Chloroform'um vena'le, is 1.45 to 1.49. It may be obtained by distilling from a mixture of chlorinated lime and alcohol,—rectifying the product by redistillation, first from a great excess of chlorinated lime, and afterwards from strong sulphuric acid. It has been used with advantage in asthma, and in diseases in which a grateful soothing agent is required. Dose, gtt. x to f℥ss or more, diluted with water. It is largely prescribed, and with great success, as an anæsthetic agent in painful diseases; and to obtund sensibility in surgical operations and in parturition,—especially in the way of inhalation; but its use requires caution. The usual quantity with this view is from f℥ss to f℥ij. See Anæsthetic.

The Pharmacopœia of the United States (1863) has a Chloroformum purifica'tum, which is made by adding sulphuric acid to commercial chloroform ; decanting the lighter liquid, and mixing it with stronger alcohol ; adding carbonate of potassa, previously heated to redness, and rubbed, while warm, into powder. The mixture is, then, thoroughly agitated, and, by means of a water bath, distilled to dryness. Its s. g. varies from 1.490 to 1.494,—s. g. (Ph. B., 1864) 1.496.

CHLORO'SIS, (χλωρος, 'green,' and osis.) Pal'lidus Mor'bus, Fœ'dus Vir'ginum co'lor, Pal'lidus co'lor virgin'eus, Pal'lor vir'ginum, Icteri''ia al'ba, Ic'terus al'bus, Leucopathi'a, Mor'bus virgin'eus seu Parthen'ius, Parthenon'osus, Chloroämæ'mia, Fœdi colo'res, Dyspep'sia chloro'sis, Fe'bris amato'ria, Cachex'ia seu Fe'bris vir'ginum, Fe'bris al'ba, Anepithym'ia chloro'sis, Chloras'ma, Chloros'ma, Chlori'asis, Citto'sis, Green-sick'ness, (F.) Chlorose, Pâles-couleurs, Chloro-anémie. A disease which affects young females, more particularly those who have not menstruated. It is characterized by a pale, lurid complexion, languor, listlessness, depraved appetite and digestion, palpitation, &c. The disease generally goes off on the occurrence of the menstrual flux; but sometimes it is long before this is established, and, at times, the catamenia are in much larger quantity than usual. To this last form M. Trousseau has given the name chlorose hémorrhagique.

The blood of chlorosis is generally thin, light-coloured and deficient in red corpuscles, and in iron,—achalybhémie of Piorry, and the clot is in less proportion to the serum than in health. On auscultation, a bellows' sound has been almost invariably detected over the heart, and a continuous blowing sound in the larger arteries, (especially the carotids and subclavians,) reenforced by each systole of the ventricle, and resembling the buzzing of a humming-top, the cooing of doves, the whistling of air through a key-hole, &c., (see Bruit.) Very similar sounds are heard in the arteries after copious hemorrhage: they seem, therefore, to coincide with enfeebled circulation.

Tonics—as iron—are usually required in the treatment,—the disease most commonly occurring in those in whom there is considerable torpor of the system.

An alimentary paste prepared from the kernels of Theobro'ma cacao or Cacao, with sugar, and often aromatics. (See Cacao.) The chocolate thus simply prepared—as it is met with, indeed, in commerce—is called in France, Chocolat de santé, Chocola'ta sim'plex seu Salu'tis. It is not very easy of digestion.

In temperate climates, common cholera is not usually a disease of much consequence. It requires that the stomach and bowels should be cleared, and afterwards the irritation be allayed by full doses of opium. In malignant cholera, large doses of calomel, with opiates, form the great reliance of many practitioners. In the worst forms, however, it runs its course, unmodified by treatment.

CHOLERA INFAN'TUM, Chol'eric Fe'ver of Infants; Cholera of Infants, (F.) Choléra infantile. A disease so termed by American physicians. It occurs, generally, in the middle states of the Union, in June or July, and continues during the hot weather, hence called the 'summer complaint.' The chief symptoms are vomiting, purging of green or yellow matter, slime or blood, attended with pain or uneasiness, and swelling of the abdomen, with some pyrexia, generally. The heat of the weather seems to be the predisposing, if not the exciting, cause. It is a fatal disease in towns; differing little, if at all, from what is vulgarly called the Wa'tery Gripes in England. Clearing, gently, the alimentary canal, so as to remove the offending matter, and then exhibiting chalk mixture and laudanum, with counter-irritants, as spice cataplasms to the abdomen, is the most satisfactory plan of treatment.

CHO'RION, (χοριον, 'skin,' from χωρειν, 'to contain,' (include); [?]) Camis'ia Fœ'tûs. A thin, transparent membrane, formerly confounded with the decidua, which surrounds the fœtus in utero on every side, and appears to be developed from nucleated cells formed in the Fallopian tube. Some histologists, however, consider, that it exists in the ovary. The general opinion is, that it is formed as above described; and perhaps, also, from the zona pellucida, which disappears in the tube. In the uterus, villous prolongations are formed on its surface, which have given it, with more recent writers, the name 'shaggy chorion.' These villi are probably the agents of the absorption of nutritive matter furnished from the lining membrane of the uterus.

By many anatomists, the chorion is considered to be formed of two layers; the outer, called by Burdach Exocho'rion; the inner, Endocho'rion. By others, the distinction of laminæ is denied. It is exterior to the amnion.

Chorion also means the true skin. See Cutis. By some, the Zona pellucida is so called.

Membra'na,* or simply the Cho'roid, Tu'nica vasculo'sa seu aciniform'is seu rhagoïdes Oculi, (F.) Membrane choroïde, Choroïde. A thin membrane, of a very dark colour, which lines the sclerotica internally. The part behind the iris is called Uvea. It is situate between the sclerotica and retina, has an opening, posteriorly, for the passage of the optic nerve; and terminates, anteriorly, at the great circumference of the iris, where it is continuous with the ciliary processes. Its outer surface is pretty intimately attached to the sclerotica by bloodvessels and nerves, as well as by a delicate brown tissue, which has been called Lam'ina fus'ca.

According to Ruysch, the choroid consists of two layers, to the innermost of which his son gave the name Tu'nica seu Membra'na Ruyschia'na, M. chorioca pilla'ris, (F.) Membrane Ruyschienne. The internal surface of the membrane is covered with a dark pigment, consisting of several layers of pigment cells, called Pigmen'tum ni'grum, Stra'tum pigmen'ti, Ophthalmochroï'tes, Æ'thiops an'imal, Mélaïne, Mélanine, Matière ou Principe de la Mélanose, (F.) Enduit choroïdien. Its use seems to be, to absorb the rays of light after they have traversed the retina.

CHYLE, Chylus, Suc'cus nutrit''ius, (χυλος, 'juice,' from χυω, 'I pour.') The word, in Hippocrates, means Tisane or Decoc'tion of Bar'ley, Chyla'rion. Galen first used it in its present sense; — i. e. for a nutritive fluid, extracted by intestinal absorption, from food which has been subjected to the action of the digestive organs. It is of a whitish appearance; and is formed from the chyme in the duodenum, and the rest of the small intestines, by the chyliferous vessels, which arise at the mucous surface of the intestine. Along these it passes through the mesenteric glands to the thoracic duct, and is finally poured into the left subclavian. It is composed, like the blood, of a fluid — li'quor chy'li — and of chyle cor'puscles or glob'ules, the average size of which is about 1-4600th of an inch. They, who regard the chyle to be nothing more than fatty matter of the food, apply the term to the emulsified oil in the intestinal canal even before it is taken up by the chyliferous vessels. See Chyme.

It has, at times, been applied to the changes produced on the aliment in the small intestine; but is now restricted to the act of forming chyle at the radicles of the chyliferous vessels.

In this state it continues until it reaches the biliary and pancreatic ducts, which open into the duodenum, where the conversion into chyle occurs, which is absorbed by the chyliferous vessels,—the excrementitious portion of the food traversing the large intestine to be evacuated per anum. Castelli asserts, that Chyme and Chyle were used in an inverse sense by the ancients to that accepted at present.

(F.) Chimie ou Chymie. A branch of the natural sciences, whose object is to investigate the nature and properties of bodies, simple and compound, inorganic and organized; and to study the force or power, by virtue of which every combination is effected. It investigates the action between the integrant molecules or atoms of bodies.

Organ'ic Chemistry, Chymi'a organ'ica, Organochemi'a, is the chymistry of organized substances, —animal and vegetable. Animal Chym'istry, Zoöch'emy or Zoöch'ymy, Zoöchemi'a, is the chymistry of substances afforded by the dead or living animal body. This branch of chymistry has been farther subdivided into physiolog''ical, when it considers the changes produced in organized bodies in health,—patholog''ical, when it regards those produced by organic or other diseases. Anthropoch'ymy, Anthropochemi'a, is the chymistry of the human body. Chymistry is called Therapeu'tical or Pharmaceu'tical, Pharmacochymi'a, Chymi'a pharmaceu'tica, when it is engaged in the analysis of simple medicines; in improving the prescribing and preparing of chemical and Galenical medicines; in the means of preparing them, and detecting adulterations, &c. Hygien'ic Chym'istry is that which is applied to the means of rendering habitations healthy, of analyzing the air we breathe, preventing the occurrence of disease, pointing out healthy aliments, and appreciating the influence of professions, &c., on the health of man. All these different subdivisions, with vegetable chymistry, Phy'tochymistry, are, at times, included under the head of Med'ical Chym'istry; at others, the term comprehends only the An'imal, Veg''etable, and Pharmaceu'tical subdivisions. Vi'tal Chemistry, Biochymi'a, is that which is exerted under the influence of vitality. Histoch'ymy, Histochemi'a, Histochem'istry, is the chemistry of the tissues, and Phlegmatoch'emy, that of the animal humours.

A knowledge of chemistry is of great importance to the physician. Many of the functions are of a chemical nature: many diseases require a chemical mode of treatment; and, without an acquaintance with it, two or more substances might be given in combination, which, by forming a chemical union, might give rise to other compounds, possessing very different virtues from the components taken singly, and thus the prescriber be disappointed in the results.

Likewise, a peculiar sort of moving organs, resembling small hairs, vi'bratory or vi'bratile cil'ia, Cil'ia vibrato'ria, (F.) Cils vibratils, Tromyles, which are visible with the microscope in many animals. These organs are found on parts of the body which are habitually in contact with water, or other more or less fluid matters, and produce motion in these fluids, impelling them along the surface of the parts. Cilia have been found to exist in all vertebrated animals except fishes, having been discovered on the respiratory, uterine, and other membranes of mammalia, birds, and reptiles.

The terms 'vibratory mo'tion' and 'cil'iary mo'tion' have been used to express the phenomena exhibited by the moving cilia; and it is probable, that this motion is concerned in the progression of fluids along the membranes. As yet, the motion has only been observed in the direction of the outlets of canals.

This is the Zo'nula cilia'ris, Zo'nula Zin'nii or Zo'nula of Zinn, Coro'na Cilia'ris, Orbic'ulus Cilia'ris. It is of a striated appearance and circular form, and assists in fixing the lens to the vitreous humour.

CINCHONÆ CARIBÆ'Æ COR'TEX, from Exostem'ma Caribæ'um, Carribæ'an or Saint Lucia Bark, (F.) Écorce de Saint Lucie, Quinquina Piton, from Exoste'ma or Exostem'ma, floribund'um; and the Pitaya Bark, Quinquina bi'color, from an exostema [?] or from strychnos pseudoquina [?], are useful substitutes for the cinchona of Peru. These are the most important spurious barks. They contain neither quinia nor cinchonia re'gia seu Calisay'a, Cor'tex Chi'næ re'gius seu fla'vus seu lu'teus, Yel'low, Royal or Calisay'a cinchona Bark, (F.) Quinquina jaune ou jaune royal, Calasaya. Odour aromatic; taste strong, bitter, astringent. Not rolled; often without the epidermis, which is very thick and inert; light, friable; fracture fibrous. Active principle Qui'nia. The false or spu'rious Calisaya barks are those of Cinchona Calisaya, variety Josephia'na; C. Bolivia'na, C. ova'ta, variety rufiner'vis, called, in Peru, Cascarilla Carabaya — the Carabay'a bark of commerce;—of C. scrobiculata, two varieties, Cus'co bark and Bark of St. Ann; of C. pubes'cens. which furnishes the Cus'co or Ari'ca bark, and of C. amygdalifolia.

CINCHONÆ LANCIFO'LIÆ COR'TEX, Cor'tex Peruvia'nus seu pal'lidus, Cincho'næ officina'lis cor'tex commu'nis, Cincho'na pal'lida, Pale Cincho'na Bark, Pale, Lox'a or Crown Bark, (F.) Quinquina gris de Loxa, Quinquina Orange. The bark of Cincho'na Condamine'a and C. micran'tha. Its odour is aromatic; taste pleasant, bitter, and astringent. The pieces are rolled in double or single quills. Epidermis brown, cracked; fracture resinous. Internally of a cinnamon colour. Its active principle is Cincho'nia.

CINCHONÆ OBLONGIFO'LIÆ COR'TEX, Cor'tex ru'ber, Cincho'næ officina'lis cor'tex ru'ber, Red Cinchona Bark, Red Bark, (F.) Quinquina rouge, (S.) Cascarilla roxa and C. colorada, of S. America. Odour and taste the same as the pale, but more intense: in large flat pieces, solid, heavy, dry; fracture short and smooth; of a deep brownish-red colour. Although this variety of bark is assigned to the Cinchona oblongifolia and C. Succiru'bra by some, it would seem, that nothing is certainly known as to its source. Active principles, Cincho'nia and Qui'nia.

The last three are the only officinal varieties in the Pharmacopœia of the United States. There are many other varieties, however, which are genuine cinchona barks, and yet have not been considered worthy of an officinal position. The Edinburgh Pharmacopœia admitted, indeed, Cincho'na cine'rea, Grey bark, Sil'ver bark or Huanu'co or Li'ma bark, which is obtained around Huannco in Peru, and, with the Jaen or Ash bark and the Huamilies bark, belongs to the class of pale or Loxa barks. Amongst the genuine but inferior barks are those brought from the northern Atlantic ports of South America, which, in commerce, are variously called Pitay'a, Bogota', Carthage'na, Maracay'bo, and San'ta Mar'tha barks. The Bogota is also called Fusagasuga and Coquetta bark.

All these barks are bitter, astringent, tonic, and eminently febrifuge. The yellow bark has been thought equal to any of the others, but the red contains more active principle. The discovery of their alkaloids is one of the most important gifts of modern chymistry. Still, in pernicious intermittents, the bark, in substance, is often demanded. It is employed in every disease in which there is deficient tone; but in cases where the stomach is much debilitated, the powder had better be avoided, in consequence of the woody fibre, which might disagree. Externally, it is used in enemata, gargles, &c., and in gangrenous ulcerations. When it excites nausea, an aromatic may be added to it; if purging, opium; if costiveness, rhubarb, &c. Dose, ʒss to ʒj or more.

ESSENTIAL SALT OF BARK, as it is called, is an extract, prepared by macerating the bruised substance of bark in cold water, and submitting the infusion to a very slow evaporation.

Cinchonicine, and its sulphate, possess the same medical properties as cinchonia and its salts. Dose, gr. v to gr. xv.

CINCH'ONINE, Cinchoni'na, Cinch'onin, Cincho'nia. The active principle of Cincho'na lancifo'lia. An organic, crystalline alkali; of a white colour, and bitter, slightly astringent taste; very soluble in alcohol and ether, but almost insoluble in water.

Cincho'niæ Sulphas, Sul'phate of Cincho'nia,— which is formed directly from cinchonia, by dissolving cinchonia, obtained from the mother-water remaining after the crystallization of sulphate of quinia by precipitation by means of solution of soda; treating it frequently with alcohol to remove other alkaloids; adding sulphuric acid to saturation, and crystallizing,—is soluble in water and alcohol. The action of the sulphate of cinchonia is similar to that of the sulphate of quinia; but it is less energetic, and consequently requires to be given in a larger dose.

Citrus Med'ica, C. Limo'num, (F.) Citronnier, Cédratier. The systematic name of the Lem'on Tree. The Lem'on, Li'mon, (Ph. U. S.), Limo'num Ma'lum seu Bac'ca, Ma'lus Med'ica, M. Limo'nia Ac"ida, Ci'trea Ma'lus, Ci'trus, (F.) Citron, Cédrat, has a fragrant odour, depending upon the essential oil, O'leum Limo'nis, of the rind. The outer rind, Cor'tex Limo'num, Limo'nis Cor'tex, Lem'on Peel, Zest, Flave'do Cor'ticum Ci'tri, is used in the same cases as the Cortex Auran'tii.

The juice, Cit'rion, Suc'cus Limo'nis, Limo'num Suc'cus (Ph. L.), (F.) Suc du Limon, Suc de Citron, is sharp, but gratefully acid, the acidity depending upon the citric acid it contains, and is given as a refrigerant beverage in febrile affections. In doses of half an ounce to an ounce, three times a day, it has appeared to some to exert a sedative influence on the circulation, and has been given, apparently with benefit, in acute rheumatism and rheumatic gout. Alone, or combined with wine, it is prescribed in scurvy, putrid sore throat, &c. Its general properties are refrigerant and antiseptic. Sweetened and diluted, it forms Lemonade. Artific"ial lem'onjuice is made by dissolving an ounce of citric acid in fourteen fluidounces of water; adding a few drops of essence of lemon.

Lemon'peel tea or wa'ter is made by paring the rind of one lemon, previously rubbed with half an ounce of sugar: the peelings and sugar are then put into a jar, and a quart of boiling water is poured over them. When cold, the fluid must be poured off, and a tablespoonful of lemon juice be added.

It is an agreeable drink in fevers.

Cit'ron Tree is likewise considered to belong to the same species—Ci'trus Med'ica. Its fruit is called cedrome'la. It is larger and less succulent than the lemon. Cit'ron juice, when sweetened with sugar, is called by the Italians Agro di Cedro.

CLIMAC'TERIC or CLIMACTER'IC, Climacter'icus, Climat'eriçus, Climater'ic, Climater'icus, (κλιµακτηρ, 'a step,') (F.) Climactérique ou Climatérique. A word, which properly signifies 'by degrees.' It has been applied to certain times of life, regarded to be critical; but is now chiefly applied to certain periods of life, at which great changes occur, independently of any numerical estimate of years. Such are the period of puberty in both sexes; that of the cessation of the menses in women, &c.

Climacteric Years, Anni Climacter'ici, are, according to some, all those in the life of man, which are multiples of the number 7, Septen'niads.

Others have applied the term to years, resulting from the multiplication of 7 by an odd number. Some have admitted only three climacterics; others, again, have extended them to multiples of 9. Most, however, have considered the 63d year to be the Grand Climacteric;—63 being the product of the multiplication of 7 by 9, and all have thought that the period of three, seven, or nine, which they respectively adopted, was necessary to the entire renewal of the body; so that there was, at these times, in the economy, none of the parts of which it had previously consisted. The climacteric years have also been called, Anni hebdomad'ici, scala'res, grada'rii, scan'siles, genethli'aci, natalit''ii, fata'les, crit'ici, decreto'rii, hero'ici, &c. All the notions on the subject are essentially allied to the doctrine of numbers of Pythagoras.

CLIMATAL, Climatic.

CLI'MATE, Cli'ma, Inclina'tio cœ'li, (F.) Climat, (κλιμα, 'a region.') In geography, the word climate is applied to a space on the terrestrial globe, comprised between two circles parallel to the equator, and arbitrarily measured according to the length of the days. In a hygienic point of view, it means, since Hippocrates, a country or region, which may differ from another in respect to season, qualities of the soil, heat of atmosphere, &c. Climate, indeed, embraces, in a general manner, all the physical circumstances belonging to each region,—circumstances which exert considerable influence on living beings. The dark complexion of the inhabitants of the torrid zone is easily distinguishable from the paleness of those of the frigid,—so are the diseases. They are all modified, more or less, by climate or locality. Hot climates predispose to abdominal complications in febrile affections; cold climates to thoracic, &c.

One of the most important considerations with regard to climates is their comparative fitness for the residence of invalids, and especially of those who are liable to, or suffering under, bronchitic or consumptive affections. The great object, in such cases, is to select a climate which will admit of regular and daily exercise in the open air, so that the invalid may derive every advantage which this form of revulsion is capable of effecting. To an inhabitant of the northern and middle portions of the United States—and the same applies to Great Britain, France, and the northern parts of the old world—a more southern climate alone has generally been considered to afford these advantages in an eminent degree. During the summer months there are few, if any, diseases, which require a milder climate than that of the United States, or of the milder districts of Europe. The temperature of the winter months is, consequently, the most important object of attention. Equability of temperature is essential, inasmuch as all sudden changes interfere with the great desideratum—exercise in the open air. In the whole continent of North America the changes are very sudden and extensive. It is not uncommon for the range to be 40°, between two successive days. So far, therefore, as this applies, the American climate is not well adapted to the invalid. In the southern portions, however, of the Union, this objection is counterbalanced by many advantages; and in the North there are many situations which afford a favorable residence to the valetudinarian during the winter. Observation has, indeed, shown, that in Minnesota, at Mackinac, and in Canada, where the air, although very cold, is dry, a sojourn there has proved at least as efficacious as in the warmer climate of the southern portion of the United States, or of Cuba; and hence, many invalids, instead of subjecting themselves to the inconveniences of temporary expatriation, pass the winter, often advantageously, in Minnesota, for example. From the Army Reports it would seem, that the dry air of New Mexico is especially favorable to those who are threatened with consumption.

The following tables exhibit the mean temperature of the year, and of the different seasons—with the mean temperature of the warmest and coldest months at different places in America, Europe, Africa, &c., as deduced from the excellent paper of Von Humboldt on Isothermal Lines, the Meteorological Registers kept by the surgeons of the United States army, under the direction of Surgeon-generals Lovell and Lawson, 1822 to 1860, the work of Sir James Clark on Climate, &c., &c. Recent, full, and, doubtless, accurate details, as regards the climate of different portions of the United States, are contained in the "Army Meteorological Register for Five Years, from January, 1855, to January, 1860"—an appendix to the "Statistical Report on the Sickness and Mortality in the Army of the United States," from January, 1855, to January, 1860: prepared under the direction of Surgeon-general Lawson, by Dr. R. H. Coolidge.

Certain of the following tables show the mean monthly temperature, maximum, minimum, and range, as well as the greatest daily, and mean daily range during the corresponding months—but of different years—at some of the prominent retreats for the valetudinarian in Great Britain, on the continent of Europe, and in the African islands. It is proper, however, to remark, that in no situations, except in those to which an asterisk is affixed, was the register thermometer used. In the others, the observations were made during the day only, and consequently the numbers given are far below the real range throughout the twenty-four hours. The places are ranged in the order of their mean temperature.

In the United States, one of the most favourable regions for the phthisical invalid was considered to be Florida. St. Augustine was frequently chosen, but it is liable to north-east storms, which interfere with the out-door movements of the valetudinarian, and are the source of much discomfort. Still, great benefit has often been derived from it as a winter residence. Of the Atlantic Isles, Madeira appears to be best adapted for the consumptive, and those affected with chronic bronchitis. In Italy, Rome, and Pisa,—and in England, Torquay and Undercliff, are to be preferred. Chronic rheumatism and gout are benefited by a warm climate, which, again, is unfavourable to those who are predisposed to cerebral diseases, especially to such as are characterized by debility and mobility of the nervous system—as paralysis, epilepsy, mania, &c. Hypochondriasis and dyspepsia require rather change of climate and travelling exercise than a sojourn in any one. (See the Author's Human Health, Philada., 1844).

COF'FEA ARAB'ICA, (Caffe'a, Ph. U. S. 1863.) C. vulga'ris, Jas'minum Arab'icum, (F.) Cafier, Caféier, and Caféyer. Order. Rubiaceæ. Sex. Syst. Pentandria Monogynia. The plant which affords coffee, Choava, Bon, Buna, (F.) Café. Originally from Yemen.

The infusion of coffee is an agreeable and wholesome article of diet. It is, to a certain extent, a tonic, and is employed as such in convalescence, especially from fevers, &c. In cases of poisoning by opium, and in old asthmas, its use has been extolled. For this purpose the Moka is the best. It ought to be newly torrefied, but not too much burnt; should be strong, and drunk soon after grinding.

A highly nitrogenized alkaloid was first found in coffee, and called Caf'ein or Caff'ein. It was afterwards discovered in the leaves of the tea plant, and called Thein, and in the Guarana of Brazil, and called Guaranin. In doses of from 2 to 10 grains, it induces violent nervous and vascular excitement. Caffein — as well as its various salts—the citrate, lactate, malate, and muriate, has been given as an antiperiodic in grain doses.

Factit'ious Coffees have been, from time to time, recommended, but they are infinitely inferior to the genuine. Various substitutes have been proposed; wheat, barley, hollyberries, acorns, sunflower seeds, beech-mast, peas, beans, succory-root, seeds of gooseberries and currants left in making wine, and washed,—sliced turnips, &c. These have been roasted, with the addition of a little butter or oil; but they have not the aroma of coffee: The best substitute is said to be the seeds of the Yellow water flag, Gladi'olus luteus or Iris pseudac'orus.

Hunt's Œconom'ical Break'fast Pow'der consisted of rye, roasted with a little butter.

It is characterized by griping pain in the bowels, chiefly about the navel, with vomiting and costiveness — the pain increasing at intervals. The indications are to clear the intestines, and allay spasm. Calomel and opium — castor oil and opium — emollient and cathartic enemata, with fomentations, wet or dry, to the abdomen, usually succeed.

Colica Crapulo'sa, C. accidenta'lis seu helluo'num, Crap'ulent col'ic, Sur'feit, Col'ic from overeat'ing, (F.) Colique d'Indigestion. A colic, arising from eating indigestible aliments, or digestible aliments in too great abundance. The remedy is obvious.

There is not much to distinguish this variety of colic from others. The same violent pain about the navel is present, with retraction of the abdomen towards the spine. It is apt also to occasion palsy. The only difference of treatment is in the necessity for employing more opium along with the purgative. The paralytic sequelæ must be met by change of air, rubbing the spine, exercise, &c. Treating the disease upon general principles is infinitely more philosophical, and more successful than the former empirical management at La Charité, Paris, which it is unnecessary to detail.

The Colic of Madrid, of Poitou, Devonshire, Normandy, &c., has been called vegetable colic, (F.) Colique végétale, because ascribed to the use of new wine or cider, unripe fruit, &c., although really, perhaps, owing to the adulteration of wines and cider by litharge. All the symptoms, indeed, are those of Colica metallica.

In the British Pharmacopœia (1864) it is prepared of Pyroxylin, ℥j; Ether, f℥xxxvj; Rectified spirit, f℥xij. When applied to a part, the ether evaporates, and the solid adhesive material is left, which contracts. Hence it is used in cases of wounds, to keep their edges together. It forms, also, a coating, and has been applied in abrasions, and in cases of burns. In various chronic cutaneous diseases, it has been applied with advantage; and has been employed to give a coating to pills, which it deprives of their taste, without interfering with their action.

COLOUR-BLINDNESS, Achromatopsia.

COL'OURS, ACCIDENT'AL, Op'posite col'ours, Complemen'tary or Harmon'ic col'ours, (F.) Couleurs Complémentaires. If the eye has been for some time regarding a particular colour, the retina becomes insensible to this colour; and if, afterwards, it is turned to a sheet of white paper, the paper will not seem to be white, but will be of the colour that arises from the union of all the rays of the solar spectrum, except the one to which the retina has become insensible. Thus, if the eye be directed for some time to a red wafer, the sheet of paper will seem to be of a bluish-green, in a circular spot of the same dimensions as the wafer. This bluish-green image is called an ocular spec'trum, because it is impressed upon the eye and may be retained for a short time; and the colour bluish-green, is said to be the accidental colour of the red. If this experiment be made with wafers of different colours, other accidental colours will be observed, varying with the colour of the wafer employed, as in the following table:—

Colour of the Wafer.	Accidental colour, or colour of the ocular spectrum.
Red	Bluish green.
Orange	Blue.
Yellow	Indigo.
Green	Violet with a little red.
Blue	Orange red.
Indigo	Orange yellow.
Violet	Yellow green.
Black	White.
White	Black.

If all the colours of the spectrum be ranged in a circle, in the proportions they hold in the spectrum itself, the accidental colour of any particular colour will be found directly opposite. Hence, the two colours have been termed op'posite col'ours. It will follow from what has been said, that if the primary colour, or that to which the eye has been first directed, be added to the accidental colour, the result must be the same impression as that produced by the union of all the rays of the spectrum—white light. The accidental colour, in other words, is what the primitive colour requires to make it white light. The primitive and accidental colours are, therefore, com'plements of each other; and hence accidental colours have also been called complemen'tary col'ours. They have likewise been termed harmon'ic, because the primitive and its accidental colour harmonize with each other in painting.

COMPLETIO, Plethora.

COM'PLEX, Complex'us, (com, and plectere, plexum, 'to twist.') Embracing several distinct things. Chaussier uses this term, in his anatomical descriptions, for complicated.

COMPLEXIO, Coition, Complexion, Confusio, Temperament.

COMPLEX'ION, Complexio. Often employed, in English, for the colour of the face, as 'He has a good complexion,'—a 'sallow complexion,' &c. It formerly had a more extensive signification, and still has in France. It signifies the aggregate of physical characters presented by any individual, considered with respect to his external arrangement or condition. It means more than constitution, for which it is used synonymously in many cases; and differs from temperament, which is less the external condition of the body than the state or disposition of the organs in health.

COMPLEXUS, Complex.

COMPLEXUS MI'NOR, Mastoïdeus latera'lis, Trache'lo-mastoïdeus, (F.) Trachélo-mastoïdien, Muscle petit Complexus. It arises from the transverse processes of the last four cervical vertebræ, and is inserted into the mastoid process.

COMPLEXUS MUS'CULUS, Bi'venter Cervi'cis, Complexus Ma'jor, Dorso-trachélon-occipital, Trachélo-occipital (Ch.), (F.) Muscle grand complexus. A muscle, situate at the hind part of the neck, where it extends from the interval that separates the two prominent ridges on the posterior surface of the os occipitis to the transverse and articular processes of the last six cervical vertebræ, as well as to those of the first five dorsal. It serves to straighten, incline, and turn the head.

COMPLICA'TION, Complica'tio, (com, and plicare, plicatum, 'to fold.') In medicine, it means the presence of several diseases, morbi complica'ti seu perplex'i, or of several adventitious circumstances foreign to the primary disease.

(F.) Compresse. Folded pieces of lint or rag, so contrived as, by the aid of a bandage, to make due pressure upon any part. According to their shape, direction, and use, compresses have been called long ((F.) longuettes,) square (carrées,) triangular, prismat'ic, grad'uated (graduées,) split (fendues,) fenêtrées, criblées, croix de Malte, oblique', cir'cular, divi'ding (divisives,) uni'ting (unisantes,) crib'riform, &c.

The Umschlag or compress of the hydropathists is a cloth, well wetted with cold water, applied to the surface near the supposed seat of disease, securely covered with a dry cloth, and changed as often as it becomes dry. It is sometimes covered with a layer of oiled silk, to prevent evaporation.

COMPRESSEUR DE DUPUYTREN, Compressor of Dupuytren—c. du Nez, Compressor nasi—c. de la Prostate, Compressor prostatæ.

COMPRESSIF, Compressive.

COMPRESSIO, (same etymon as Compress,) Compression, Thlipsis.

COMPRES'SION, Compressio, (same etymon.) Pressure; methodical compression. An agent frequently had recourse to in surgery. We compress a limb, affected with œdema, varices, hydrops articuli, callous ulcer, &c. The abdomen is compressed after delivery, after paracentesis abdominis, &c. The compression is produced by means of the roller, laced stocking, &c., according to the part, and to the particular case. Moderate pressure aids the contractility of parts, and modifies their nutritive action; so that large tumours at times disappear after it has been used for some time. A greater degree of pressure occasions, still more, the emaciation of the part, but it is apt to impede the circulation. Pressure is often used to stop or moderate the flow of blood in cases of aneurism or wounds of arteries and veins. In such cases, the compression may be immediate, when applied upon the artery itself, or it may be mediate, when applied through the integuments and soft parts. The French use the term Compression immédiate latérale for that which is exerted perpendicularly to the axis of a vessel, so as to flatten its sides. It is practised with the finger, forceps, tourniquet, &c.

Method'ical Compression is pressure applied secundum artem. Dig''ital Compression is pressure made by the fingers.

COMPRESSION OF THE BRAIN. This may arise either from coagula of blood, a soft tumour, a bony excrescence, a depressed portion of the skull, or the presence of some foreign body. The effects vary, according as the compression takes place suddenly or gradually. When suddenly, the symptoms are of the comatose or apoplectic character. When gradually, mania, convulsions, &c., are more likely to occur. Compression, arising from a depressed portion of skull, requires the use of the trephine.

COMPRES'SIVE, Compressi'vus, (F.) Compressif. That which compresses. A compressive bandage is one that compresses the parts to which it is applied.

COMPRESSOR or COMPRESSO'RIUM OF DUPUYTREN, (F.) Compresseur de Dupuytren. An instrument for compressing the femoral artery, invented by Dupuytren. It is constructed on the same principles as the tourniquet of J. L. Petit, from which it only differs in this respect;—that, instead of being maintained in its place by a strap, which always compresses more or less the circumference of the limb, the two pads are placed at the extremities of a semicircle of steel, which, by passing from one to the other without touching the parts, limits the pressure to two opposite points of the thigh, and permits the collateral circulation to go on.

COMPRESSOR NA'RIS, Rinæ'us, Nasa'lis, Transversa'lis Na'si, Myrtiform'is, Dilato'res ala'rum na'si, Constric'tor Na'si seu Na'rium seu Na'ris, Triangula'ris Na'si, (F.) Maxillo-narinal, Susmaxillo-nasal—(Ch.,) Compresseur du nez, Transversal du nez. A muscle, situate at the sides of the nose; flat and triangular. It arises from the inner part of the fossa canina, and passes to the dorsum of the nose; where it is confounded with that of the opposite side.

COMPRESSOR or CONSTRICTOR OF NUCK. An instrument for compressing the urethra, to obviate incontinence of urine. It consists of a girdle of iron, which surrounds the pelvis, to which is fixed a plate of the same metal, that compresses the urethra in perinæo.

COMPRESSOR PROS'TATÆ, Prostat'icus supe'rior, Pubioprostat'icus, Subpubioprostat'icus, (F.) Compresseur de la prostate. A muscle, admitted by ALBINUS, which is formed of the anterior fibres of the Levator ani, that embrace the prostate. It is the Prostat'icus supe'rior of WINSLOW.

COMPRESSOR URE'THRÆ. A muscle consisting of two portions—one of which is transverse in its direction, and, in consequence of its having been particularly described by Mr. Guthrie, has been called Guth'rie's muscle. It arises from the ramus of the ischium, and passes inwards to embrace the membranous urethra. The other portion is perpendicular, descending from the pubis and passing down to be inserted into the transverse portion of the muscle; — Pu'bio-urethra'lis. This portion has been considered by many to be only the anterior fibres of the levator ani; and having been described by Mr. Wilson, it has been called Wil'son's muscle.

COMPRESSOR VE'NÆ DORSA'LIS PE'NIS. A small muscle, distinctly seen in animals, less distinctly in man, which arises from the ramus of the pubis, and ascending in a direction forwards is inserted above the vena dorsalis, joining with its fellow of the opposite side on the mesial line. Its use is supposed to compress the vein in erection. It is sometimes called the muscle of Hous'ton, after Dr. Houston of Dublin.

The whole subject of conception is most mysterious. It seems to occur as follows. During the sexual union, the male sperm passes along the uterus and Fallopian tubes: the fimbriated extremities of the latter size hold of the ovarium; and the sperm in this manner comes in contact with a matured ovum, and impregnates it. The fecundated ovum remains some time in the ovarium, but at length bursts its covering, is laid hold of by the fimbriated extremity of the Fallopian tubes, and passes along the tube into the cavity of the uterus, where it remains for the full period of utero-gestation. Some are of opinion, that the ovum is not impregnated until it has entered the Fallopian tube, or uterus.

CONCEP'TION, FALSE, Falsus Concep'tus, Spu'rium germen, (F.) Fausse Conception, Faux germe. An irregular, preternatural conception, the result of which is a mole or some similar production, instead of a properly organized fœtus. See Mole.

CON'CHA, Conchus, (κογχη, κογχος, 'a concave shell.') A liquid measure, amongst the Athenians, equal to half an ounce. Anatomists apply this term to several hollow parts of the body;—as the Concha of the Ear,—Concha Auris, Concha Auric'ulæ; (F.) Conque—the hollow part of the cartilage of the external ear. It has, also, been applied to the genital organs of the female; to the patella, &c.

CONCRE'TION, Concre'tio, Concremen'tum, (concrescere, concretum, (con, and crescere,) 'to condense, thicken, become solid;') Pexis, Sympex'is, (F.) Concrétion. The act of becoming thick or solid. It was once used synonymously with adhesion or growing together—as 'concretion of the toes.' Most commonly, it is applied to extraneous and inorganic bodies, of a solid character, met with in different textures, after certain chronic inflammations; or which make their appearance in the joints or in the reservoirs for excrementitial fluids. Concretion is, therefore, frequently synonymous with Calculus, and is then rendered, in Latin, by the word Concrementum. But Concretion has a more extensive signification than Calculus; thus, accidental ossifications or deposits of phosphates of lime in certain organs, and especially in the liver and lungs, are properly called osseous concretions. They could not well be called osseous calculi.

In Surgery, it is used for the agitation often communicated to one organ by a fall upon another; as to the brain from a fall on the breech, &c.

In all severe injuries, in sudden encephalic hemorrhage, and in overwhelming emotions, a concussion or shock is felt to a greater or less extent in the nervous system, which requires the careful attention of the physician.

Concussion of the Brain, Commo'tio Cer'ebri, Apoplex'ia nervo'sa traumat'ica, Encephalosis'mus, (F.) Commotion du Cerveau, sometimes gives rise to alarming symptoms, even to abolition of the functions of the brain, yet without any sensible organic disease. Slight concussion of the brain, called stunning, consists in vertigo, tinnitus aurium, loss of memory, and stupefaction; all these being temporary. When more severe, there is instant loss of sensation and volition, vomiting, the patient being as if in a sound sleep, but there is no stertorous breathing. Pulse variable, generally more rapid and feeble than in compression; extremities cold. Little can be done here, till reaction has occurred: after this, the case must be treated according to general principles,—by bleeding, blisters, cold applied to the head, &c. After severe concussion, a patient, although apparently well, is not safe till some time after the accident.

CON'DIMENT, Condimen'tum, Ar'tyma, Hedys'ma, Conditu'ra, (condire, conditum, 'to season.') (F.) Assaisonnement. Some substances are called, at times, aliments, and at others, condiments, according as they constitute the basis or the accessory to any dish: such are cream, butter, mushrooms, olives, &c. Others are always condiments, as they are only used to improve the savour of food, and contain little or no nutritive matter. Such are pepper, salt, cinnamon, &c. Almost all condiments are possessed of stimulant properties.

The intestinum cæcum of a sheep, soaked for some hours in water, turned inside out, macerated again in weak, alkaline ley, changed every twelve hours, and scraped carefully to abstract the mucous membrane, leaving the peritoneal and muscular coats exposed to the vapour of burning brimstone, and afterwards washed with soap and water. It is then blown up, dried, cut to the length of seven or eight inches, and bordered at the open end with a riband. It is drawn over the penis prior to coition, to prevent venereal infection and pregnancy.

A kind of process, met with more particularly in the ginglymoid joints;—such as the condyles of the occipital, inferior maxillary bone, &c. Some anatomists have applied the term, however, to eminences that are not articular,—as to the lateral tuberosities at the inferior extremity of the os humeri, and even to certain depressions,—as to the concave articular surfaces at the upper extremity of the tibia. Chaussier calls the transverse root of the zygomatic process Condyle of the temporal bone.

As the word Condyloïdien means, 'that which has the shape of a condyle,' it has been judiciously proposed by some French anatomists that condylien should be used in preference, in the cases of the foramina and fossæ.

Duc'tus alimenta'rii, O. intestina'lis, Tor'por intestino'rum, Styp'sis, Constipa'tio al'vi, Copros'tasis, Acop'ria, Acopro'sis, Coprocëpis'chesis, Ischocop'ria, Dyscoil'ia, Cost'iveness, Fæ'cal reten'tion, Al'vine obstruc'tion, Stopping or Stoppage of the Bowels* or Guts or Stomach, (F.) Échauffement, Ventre resserré. A state of the bowels, in which the evacuations do not take place as frequently as usual; or are inordinately hard, and expelled with difficulty. It may be owing either to diminished action of the muscular coat of the intestines, or to diminished secretion from the mucous membrane, or to both. Cathartics will usually remove it; after which its exciting and predisponent causes must be inquired into and obviated, to render the cure permanent.

CONSTIPATUS, Constipated.

CONSTIPÉ, Constipated.

CONSTITUENS, Vehicle, see Prescription.

CONSTITUTIO, (constituere, constitutum, 'to set up;' from con, and statuere, itself from stare, statum, 'to stand,') Constitution, Habit of body—c. Aeris, Constitution of the atmosphere—c. Epidemica, Constitution, epidemic—c. Nervosa, Nervous diathesis.

CONSTITU'TION, Constitu'tio, Catas'tasis, Sta'tus. A collection of several parts, forming a whole. In medicine, Constitution means the state of all the organs of the human body considered in regard to their special and relative arrangement, order, or activity. A good constitution is one in which every organ is well developed, and endowed with due energy, so that all perform their functions with equal facility. Any want of equilibrium in their development and energy forms a difference in the constitution. We say that a man is of a good or robust, a delicate or weak constitution, when he is commonly healthy, or commonly labouring under, or unusually susceptible of, disease.

CONSTITUTION, ARTERIAL, Plethora arteriosa.

CONSTITUTION OF THE AT'MOSPHERE, Constitu'tio A'ëris, (F.) Constitution Atmosphérique. The condition of the atmosphere, as regards dryness and humidity, temperature, heaviness, direction of the winds, &c., considered as respects its influence on the animal economy.

CONSTITUTION, EPIDEM'IC. Constitu'tio epidem'ica, Med'ical Constitution, (F.) Constitution médicale, C. épidémique. The aggregate of meteorological conditions, during which diseases prevail epidemically.

CONSTITU'TIONAL, (F.) Constitutionnel. Belonging to the constitution of an individual,—to his manner of being; as constitutional phthisis, c. gout, &c. By some, this epithet has been given to diseases, produced by the constitution of the atmosphere; but this acceptation is not common.

CONSTRICTEUR D'HERBINEAUX, see Serre-nœud—c. du Vagin, Constrictores cunni—c. de la Vulve, Constrictores cunni.

Small muscles, which originate beneath the clitoris, descend along the sides of the vagina, and terminate by becoming confounded with the transversus perinæi and external sphincter ani muscles. Their use is to contract the entrance of the vagina.

CONSTRICTORES PHARYN'GIS, Constric'tors of the Phar'ynx, Sphinc'ter Gu'læ. Muscular expansions which assist in forming the parietes of the pharynx. Three of these are generally admitted. 1. The Constric'tor Pharyn'gis infe'rior, Cri'copharynge'us and Thy'ro-pharynge'us, (F.) Cricothyro-pharyngien. It is broad, very thin, quadrilateral, seated superficially, extending from the thyroid and cricoid cartilages as far as the middle of the pharynx, and uniting, on the median line, with that of the opposite side. 2. The Constric'tor Pharyn'gis Me'dius, Hyopharynge'us and Chond-opharynge'us, Syndesmopharyngeus, (F.) Hyoglosso-basi-pharyngien, occupies the middle part of the pharynx. It is triangular, and attached anteriorly to the great and little cornu of the os hyoides; to the stylohyoid ligament; and terminates, posteriorly, by joining its fellow of the opposite side. 3. The Constric'tor Pharyn'gis supe'rior, Ceph'alopharynge'us, Glos'sopharynge'us, My'lopharynge'us, Pter'ygopharynge'us, (F.) Ptérygo-syndesmo-staphyli-pharyngien is quadrilateral, and extends from the internal ala of the pterygoid process, from the inter-maxillary ligament, from the internal oblique line of the jaw, and from the base of the tongue, to the posterior part of the pharynx.

The constrictors of the pharynx contract it. They can likewise approximate the ends to each other. Chaussier considers those and the stylopharyngeus as but one muscle, and includes all under this last name.

CONSTRICTORES VAGINÆ, C. cunni—c. Vulvæ, C. cunni.

CONSULTANT, Consulting physician or surgeon.

CONSULTA'TION, Consulta'tio, Delibera'tio, Cœnolog''ia, Conten'tio, Symboleu'sis, (consulere, consultum, 'to hold council.') This word has several acceptations. In English, it means, almost always, the meeting of two or more practitioners, to deliberate on any particular case of disease. In France, it signifies the written result of such deliberations, as well as the opinion of a physician, given to a patient, who consults him, either personally or by writing.

CONSULT'ING PHYSIC''IAN or SUR'GEON, (F.) Médecin ou Chirurgien consultant, Consultant. One who consults with the attending practitioner regarding any case of disease. Some physicians, surgeons, and accoucheurs confine themselves to consulting practice.

CONSUMMATUM, Consommé.

CONSUMMA'TUS, (consummare (con, and summus 'the whole,') 'to accomplish.') Confirmed; established; developed,—as Phthis'is consumma'ta, 'confirmed consumption.'

CONSUMPTIO, Consumption.

CONSUMP'TION, (consumere (con, and sumere, sumptum) 'to waste away;') Consump'tio, Consum'tio, Syntex'is, Wasting, Wearing, (F.) Consomption. Progressive emaciation or wasting away. This condition precedes death in the greater part of chronic diseases, and particularly in phthisis pulmonalis: on this account it is, that phthisis has received the name consumption—See Phthisis. Fièvre de Consomption, Consump'tive fe'ver, is the same as Hectic fever.

CONSUMPTION OF THE BOWELS, Enterophthisis.

CONSUMPTION, GAL'LOPING, Phthi'sis acu'ta, (F.) Phthisie galopante ou aiguë. Phthisis pulmonalis, which rapidly runs through its course to a fatal termination.

CON'TACT, Contac'tus, (con, and tangere, tactum, 'to touch.') The state of two bodies that touch each other. In the theory of contagious diseases, we distinguish immediate or direct contact, as when we touch a patient labouring under one of those diseases; and mediate or indirect contact, when we touch, not the patient himself, but objects that have touched or emanated from him. The air is, most commonly, the medium by which this last kind of contact is effected.

CONTA'GION, Conta'gio, Conta'ges, Conta'gium, Aporrhœ'a, Apoc'rysis. The transmission of a disease from one person to another by direct or indirect contact. The term has, also, been applied, by some, to the action of miasmata arising from dead animal or vegetable matter, bogs, fens, &c., but in this sense it is now abandoned. Contagious diseases are produced either by a virus, capable of causing them by inoculation, as in small-pox, cow-pox, hydrophobia, syphilis, &c., or by miasmata, proceeding from a sick individual, as in plague, typhus gravior, and in measles and scarlatina. [?] Scrofula, phthisis pulmonalis, and cancer, have, by some, been esteemed contagious, but apparently without foundation. Physicians are, indeed, by no means unanimous in deciding what diseases are contagious, and what not. The contagion of plague and typhus, especially of the latter, is denied by many. It seems probable, that a disease may be contagious under certain circumstances and not under others. A case of common fever, arising from common causes, as from cold, if the patient be kept in a close, foul situation, may be converted into a disease, capable of producing emanations, which may excite a similar disease in those exposed to them. Contagion and infection are generally esteemed synonymous. Frequently, however, the former is applied to diseases not produced by contact; as measles, scarlet fever, [?] &c., whilst infection, (Prov.) Smit, is used for those that require positive contact; as itch, syphilis, &c., and conversely. Diseases which cannot be produced in any other way than by contagion, are said to have their origin in specif'ic contagion; as small-pox, cow-pox, measles, hydrophobia, syphilis, &c. Those which are produced by contagion, and yet are supposed to be sometimes owing to other causes, are said to arise from common contagion; as typhus, cynanche parotidæa, &c.

CONTA'GIONIST, (F.) Contagioniste. One who believes in the contagious character of a particular disease,—as of yellow fever.

CONTA'GIOUS, Contagio'sus, (F.) Contagieux. Capable of being transmitted by mediate or immediate contact, Commu'nicable,—as a contagious disease, contagious fever, contagious effluvia, &c. Commonly, the epithet infec'tious, (F.) Infectieux, (Prov.) Ta'king, Smit'tle, Catch'ing, is applied to those that are communicated by immediate contact, as itch, syphilis, &c.

CONTAGIUM, Contagion, Miasm.

CONTEMPLABILES DIES, Critical days.

CONTEMPLATIF (F.), Contem'plative, Contemplati'vus, (con, and templum, 'a place for observation.') Appertaining to contemplation. The predominant idea of the melancholic—of the monomaniac—is sometimes called contemplative.

A name given, metaphorically, to the structure of organized bodies; as the contexture of muscles, fibres, &c. See Tissue, and Texture.

CONTIGUITY, DIARTHROSIS OF, (con, and tangere, 'to touch, to be near,') see Continuity.

CONTINENS, gen. Continen'tis, Continent.

CON'TINENT, Con'tinens. Restrained. This word is synonymous, also, with Continued; (F.) Continu.

CONTINENT CAUSE, Cau'sa conjunc'ta, is a cause, real or presumed, which having given rise to a disease, continues to act during the whole of its duration. It may be considered synonymous with proximate cause. A con'tinent fe'ver, Fe'bris con'tinens, is one which preserves during its whole course, the same degree of intensity, without any remission or sensible exacerbation. A disease which continues uninterruptedly, has been also called Æipathei'a, Aeipathei'a or Aïpathi'a.

CONTINENTIA, Continence.

CONTIN'UED FE'VER, Fe'bris contin'ua seu con'tinens seu anabat'ica seu assid'ua. A fever which presents no interruption in its course. Continued fevers form a division in the class Pyrexiæ of Cullen, and include three genera,—Synocha, Synochus, and Typhus. It is proper to remark, that some of the older writers make a distinction between the continual fever, συνεχης, fe'bris contin'ua, and the syn'ochus or fe'bris con'tinens. Thus, Rhases states that the synochus or continens is a fever, which consists of one paroxysm from beginning to end; whilst the continua is allied to intermittents.

CONTINU'ITY, Continu'itas. An adhesion of two things between each other, so that they cannot be separated without fracture or laceration.

CONTINUITY, DIARTHRO'SES OF, (F.) Diarthroses de Continuité, are movable joints, in which the bones are continuous, but do not touch immediately, there being between them a ligamentous substance, whose flexibility permits motion. The vertebral articulations are examples of this. DIARTHROSES OF CONTIGU'ITY, Diarthroses de Contiguité, on the other hand, are movable articulations, in which the bones are not continuous, but touch by surfaces covered with a cartilaginous layer, which is always moistened by synovia.

CONTINUITY, LESION OF, see Continuity, solution of.

CONTINUITY, SOLU'TION OF, Solu'tio contin'uï, is any division of parts, previously continuous. Wounds and fractures are solutions of continuity. The word Continuity is opposed to Contiguity: the latter meaning the condition of two things which are near each other, or touch without uniting. There is contiguity between the head of the humerus and the glenoid cavity of the scapula, but not continuity.

A le'sion of continuity, Læ'sio contin'uï, is a destruction of continuity caused by disease.

CONTONDANT, Contunding.

CONTOR'SION, Contor'tio, (contorqueo, (con and torquere, tortum, 'to wring,') 'I twist about.') Violent movement of a part, accompanied with a kind of torsion, twist or cast; as contortion of the face.

CONTRAC'TILE, Contrac'tilis, (contrahere, (con, and trahere, tractum,) 'to draw together.') Capable of contracting. The fibre of muscles is contractile.

CONTRACTIL'ITY, Contractil'itas, (F.) Contractilité. That vital property, which gives, to certain parts, the power of contracting. The muscles of locomotion are endowed with a power of voluntary contractility, or one dependent immediately on the action of the brain:—the muscles of the viscera of digestion, and other internal organs, enjoy an involuntary contractility. Contractility and irritability are frequently used synonymously to signify the property possessed by any tissue of contracting on the application of an appropriate stimulus.

CONTRACTILITY, Irritability.

CONTRACTIO, Contraction — c. Cordis, Systole.

CONTRAC'TION, Contrac'tio. Sys'tolē. Action of contracting. When we speak of the contraction of a muscle, we mean the phenomenon it exhibits during the time it is in action.

CONTRACTU'RA. Acamp'sia, Enta'sia articula'ris, Ri'gor ar'tuum, Mus'cular Stiffjoint, (F.) Contracture. A state of permanent rigidity and progressive atrophy of the flexor muscles, which prevents the motions of extension beyond a certain limit. The affected muscles form hard cords beneath the skin. On dissection, they are found converted into tendinous fibres, the fleshy fibres having almost disappeared, when the disease has been of any duration. It frequently succeeds other diseases, particularly rheumatism, neuralgia, convulsions, syphilis, colica pictonum, &c. The warm bath, vapour bath, or thermal waters, oleaginous embrocations, mechanical extension of the limbs, &c., are the chief means of treatment.

A fracture, contusion, or injury, produced, by a blow, in a part distant from that which is struck. Five species of contrafissuræ or contre-coups may occur in the skull. 1. When the internal table yields and fractures. 2. When the bone breaks in any other part than the one struck. 3. When a bone, which has been struck, remains uninjured, and its neighbour is fractured. 4. When the bone is fractured in a place diametrically opposite to that struck, as in fractures at the base of the cranium, from a fall on the vertex; and lastly, when the violence of the blow produces a separation of the neighbouring or distant sutures. These fractures of the skull are also called Fractures par résonnance.

CONTROSTIM'ULANT, Contrastim'ulans, Hyposthen'ic, (F.) Hyposthe'nique, (contra, and stimulus, 'that which excites.') A substance that possesses a particular, debilitating property, acting upon the excitability in a manner opposite to stimulus. A name given to therapeutical agents, which, according to the Italian theory of controstimulus, are endowed with the property of diminishing excitement by a specific action. These agents are by no means clearly defined.

CONTROSTIM'ULUS or CONTRASTIMULUS, DOCTRINE OF, (F.) Contrestimulisme. Same etymon. The name given by Rasori, half a century ago, to a new medical doctrine, of which he was the originator—La nuova Dottrina Medica Italiana. It is founded on the contro-stimulant—Rasorian—property attributed to a certain number of medicines. In this doctrine, as in that of Brown, under the name excitability a fundamental principle of physiology is admitted, by virtue of which living beings are endowed with an aptitude for feeling the action of external agents or exciting influences, and of reacting on these influences. When this excitability is too great, there is excess of stimulus or Hypersthen'ia: when too little, there is deficiency or Hyposthen'ia. Diseases, general and local, are divided into three great classes, or into, 1. Hypersthen'ic; 2. Hyposthen'ic; 3. Ir'ritative. The contro-stimulant physicians admit only two classes of medicines — stimulants and contro-stimulants.

An injury or lesion —arising from the impulse of a body with a blunt surface—which presents no loss of substance, and no apparent wound. If the skin be divided, the injury takes the name of contused wound. The differences of contusions, as to extent, are of course infinite. When slight, the blood stagnates in the capillaries of the skin, or is effused into the subcutaneous areolar tissue. Time and cold applications remove it. When the texture has been lacerated, there is effusion of blood, with more or less torpor in the part affected. Cooling applications, general or topical bleeding, emollients, poultices, &c., are here necessary, according to circumstances. In the severest kinds of contusion, all the soft and solid parts, except the skin, are bruised, and, at times, reduced to a kind of pap. When the disorganization is to this extent, there is no hope except in amputation. A deep contusion of the soft parts has been called Sarcoth'lasis, and Sarcothlas'ma.

Contusion, Wind, see Wind of a Ball.

CONTUSUS, Contused.

CO'NUS ARTERIO'SUS, ('arterial cone,') Infundib'ulum of the heart. The portion of the right ventricle from which the pulmonary artery proceeds, forms a prominence on the right side of the anterior furrow of the heart, and is prolonged towards the left, becoming narrower at the same time, so as to form a funnel-shaped projection, which extends a little beyond the base of the ventricles. This is the Conus arteriosus.

Its operation is cathartic, the resinous part griping violently. Dose, 10 gr. to ʒss. A drop or two of any essential oil may prevent it from griping. CO'RIUM, Cho'rion, Co'rion, (F.) Cuir. The skin of animals is so called, especially when tanned. The cutis vera, or the thickest part of the human skin.

CORIUM PHLOGIS'TICUM, Crus'ta pleuret'ica seu inflammato'ria seu phlogis'tica, Peg'min, Inflam'matory Crust or Buff, Buffy Coat, (F.) Couenne, C. Pleurétique, C. Inflammatoire. The grayish crust or buff, varying in thickness, observed on blood drawn from a vein during the existence of violent inflammation, pregnancy, &c. It is particularly manifest in pleurisy, and hence one of its names. For its production, it appears to be requisite that there should be an increase in the proportion of the fibrinous element of the blood over that of the red corpuscles, with augmented aggregation of those corpuscles. The blood is then longer in coagulating, and the red corpuscles have time to subside. In highly inflammatory conditions, the buffy coat assumes a concave appearance on its upper surface, and the blood is, therefore, said to be cupped. Polli gave to the coagulative substance the name brad'yfi'brin. It is the ordinary fibrin of the blood,—the only self-coagulable ingredient in it.

When the blood presents the above appearance, it is said to be buffy or sizy.

CORN, (Saxon corn,) (G.) Kern. In England, this word means the Cerealia, or those seeds which grow in ears, not in pods. In the United States Corn always means Indian Corn. Its English sense corresponds to the French Blé or Bled.

CORN, (from cornu, 'a horn,') Cla'vus, Cla'vus Pe'dis, Ecphy'ma Cla'vus, Gemur'sa, (F.) Cor, Ognon. A small, hard, corneous tumour, which forms upon the foot, generally on the toes; and is commonly produced on the most projecting parts by the pressure of too tight shoes. A part of the corn is raised above the skin, and forms a round tumour, like the head of a nail: the other portion, which serves as its base, is buried more or less deeply in the integuments, and occasionally extends as far as the tendons and periosteum. Corns may, sometimes, be removed, by immersing the feet in warm water, but commonly they return. They can, likewise, be destroyed by the knife or caustic, or by paring them down and pulling them out by the roots; but these operations are not always as simple as they seem. In the way of palliation, they must be constantly pared; and for the purpose of preventing pressure, any soft plaster, spread upon linen or leather, may be applied, with a hole in the centre to receive the corn; and layer after layer of plaster be added, until they attain the level of the corn. When very irritable, lunar caustic, rubbed over the surface, will generally diminish irritability surprisingly, and in a mode not easy of explanation.

The transpa'rent cor'nea. (F.) Cornée. One of the coats of the eye, so called because it has some resemblance to horn. It is termed transparent to distinguish it from the opake — Cornea opa'ca or Sclerot'ic. It is convex, anteriorly; concave, posteriorly; forming nearly one-fifth of the anterior part of the eye, and representing a segment of a sphere, about seven lines and a half, or in. 0·625 in diameter. It seems to be constituted of laminæ in superposition, but of the precise number anatomists are not agreed. calcinée, Phosphate de chaux, which consists of 57·5 per cent. of phosphate of lime. It has been used as an antacid, but is wholly inert, as its composition would indicate. It contains only 1 per cent. of carbonate of lime.

Phosphate of lime has also been given in osteomalacia, from a presumption that the disease is owing to a deficiency of earthy matter in the blood, which is doubtless an error—the fault being in the agents of assimilation or the cells of nutrition. With as little propriety, it has been proposed as an excitant to the healthy action of the cells in tuberculosis.

Bone earth is usually sold in the shops for burnt hartshorn.

The British Pharmacopœia (1864), and the Pharmacopœia of the United States, have a Cornu Phosphas Præcipita'ta, Precip'itated Phosphate of Lime, prepared by dissolving burnt ox bones in muriatic acid, and precipitating by solution of ammonia. The dried precipitate, called bone phosphate of lime, has no virtues not possessed by the cornu ustum.

It then proceeds to the end of the corpora cavernosa, and terminates in the glans penis, which it forms. Where the urethra enters the bulb, it is surrounded by a layer of erectile tissue, called, by Kobelt, Collic'uli bulbi. Kobelt describes, in the female, as the analogue to the corpus spongiosum of the male, a venous plexus, which, as it lies between the glans clitoridis, and the part that corresponds, in the male, to the bulb of the urethra, he terms pars interme'dia, (F.) Réseau intermédiaire.

According to Müller, they disappear in man very early, so that but slight remains of them are perceptible after the 9th or 10th week of pregnancy. They cover the region of the kidneys and renal capsules, which are formed afterwards; and they are presumed to be the organs of urinary secretion during the first periods of fœtal existence.

Strähl (1848) to call them Vate'rian corpuscles or Corpuscles of Vater (Vater'sche Körperchen.) Small bodies connected with the cutaneous nerves of the palm and sole. They have also been found sparingly and inconstantly in nerves at the wrist and elbow, the upper arm, fore-arm, and thigh, and in the inter-costal nerve, the sacral plexus, solar plexus and the plexuses adjacent to it. In each corpuscle there is the termination of a nervous filament. Their uses are not known.

Gall considers, that this substance forms the nerves; and therefore calls it Substance matrice des Nerfs.

The name cortical is likewise given to the external substance of the kidneys, because it is of a deeper colour than the inner part of the organ, and forms a kind of envelope to it.

CORTEX O'VI, Cor'tical mem'brane. This membrane, so called by Boer and Granville, is usually regarded as a uterine production, and designated Decid'ua reflex'a. They consider it to surround the ovule, when it descends into the uterus, and to enclose the shaggy chorion. It is absorbed during the first months of utero-gestation, so as to expose the next membrane to the contact of the decidua, with which a connexion takes place at the part where the placenta is to be formed. In that part, Boer and Granville consider, that the Cortex Ovi is never altogether obliterated, but only made thinner, and in process of time is converted into a mere pellicle or envelope, which not only serves to divide the filiform vessels of the chorion into groups or cotyledons, in order to form the placenta, but also covers those cotyledons. This, Dr. Granville calls membra'na pro'pria. See Decidua membrana.

Words introduced, since Gall, into medical language. (The first two terms are respectively derived from cranio, λογος, 'a discourse,' and σκοπειν, 'to examine.') They signify a description, or simply an examination, of the different parts of the external surface of the cranium, in order to deduce from it a knowledge of the different intellectual and moral dispositions. Strictly speaking, it is by Cra'nioscopy or Or'ganoscopy that we acquire a knowledge of Craniol'ogy, Organol'ogy, or Cranol'ogy, as it has been variously termed. These words are generally, however, used in the same sense. The cranium being moulded to the brain, there are as many prominences on the bone as there are projections at the surface of the brain. According to Gall, each projection, which he calls an organ, is the seat of a particular intellectual or moral faculty, and all persons endowed with the same faculty, have, at the same part of the brain, a prominence, which is indicated, externally, by a bump or projection in the bony case. The System of Gall is made to comprise 27 prominences, which answer to 27 primary faculties.

A fundamental principle with the Craniologists or Phrenologists is,—that the brain does not act as a single organ, but that it consists of a plurality of organs; but, were we able to admit this, the assignment of the seat of different faculties could not but be considered premature.

CRITICAL DAYS, Dies Crit'ici seu Judicato'rii seu Decreto'rii seu Prin'cipes seu Radica'les seu Contemplab'iles seu Internun'cii, (F.) Jours critiques, are those on which a crisis, it is imagined, is most likely to happen. According to Hippocrates and Galen, the greatest number of fevers terminate favourably on the 7th day; and many on the 14th;—these two days being the most propitious. Next to these come, in order of efficiency, the 9th, 11th, 20th or 21st, 17th, 5th, 4th, 3d, 18th, 27th, and 28th. The sixth day was called, by Galen, the Tyrant, τυραννος, because the crises that happened then were generally unfavourable. After this, the most unfavourable were the 8th, 10th, 12th, 16th, and 19th. The 13th was a sort of neutral day; the crises which happened on it being neither favourable nor unfavourable. Days were, also, divided into Inter'calary, on which the crises happened less frequently, and were less complete than on the critical or in'dicatory;—and into vacant and nondec'retory, on which a crisis hardly ever occurred. According to this division, they were enumerated as follows:—

Critical days.....7th, 14th, 20th, 27th, 34th, 40th, 60th, &c.
Indicatory days.....4th, 11th, 17th, 24th, &c.
Intercalary days.....3d, 5th, 6th, 9th, &c.
Non-decretory days....2d, 8th, 10th, 12th, 13th, &c.

Fortunate crises were considered to be indicated by favourable signs appearing three days before.

CRURAL, Triceps cruris.

CRURAL ARCH, In'guinal or Fem'oral Arch, (F.) Arcade crurale ou inguinale, (Ch.), Poupart's Ligament, L. of Fallo'pius. This arch is formed by the internal portion of the inferior edge of the aponeurosis of the obliquus externus muscle, which is attached, at one end, to the pubis; at the other, to the anterior and superior spinous process of the ilium. At its posterior and inner part, the aponeurosis, forming the arch, sends off a falciform reflection, which is attached along the crest of the pubis, and is known under the name of GIMBERNAT'S Ligament. Beneath this arch, the vessels, nerves, and muscles make their exit from the pelvis to the thigh.

CRURAL AR'TERY, Arte'ria Crura'lis, Fem'oral Ar'tery, (F.) Artère crurale, is the continuation of the external iliac. It extends from the crural arch to the aperture in the triceps, or to the ham. Chaussier applies the name Artère crurale to the trunk, which extends from the primitive or common iliac to the tibial arteries — embracing, of course, the external iliac, femoral, and popliteal.

CRURAL CANAL', Crural Ring, Fem'oral canal' or ring. M. Jules Cloquet has described this canal with minuteness, and given it the name Anneau crural, Anneau fémoral. It is nearly an inch long, triangular, more spacious above than below, and shorter and broader in the female than in the male. Its upper orifice is bounded, anteriorly, by the crural arch; posteriorly, by the crista of the pubis; on the outer side by the psoas and iliacus muscles, covered by the iliac aponeurosis, and, at the inner, by Gimbernat's ligament. This orifice is covered by the peritoneum, and, according to M. Cloquet, is closed by a more or less resisting septum, which he has named Sep'tum crura'le, Cru'ral Sep'tum. In its course, the crural canal has its anterior parietes formed by the superficial expansion of the fascia lata: the posterior by the pectineus, covered by the deep-seated expansion of the fascia; and more externally by the psoas and iliacus muscles, covered by an expansion of the fascia iliaca. Its inferior orifice is formed by the foramen of the fascia lata, which gives passage to the vena saphæna. It is at the upper orifice of this canal, that Fem'oral or Cru'ral Her'nia, Hernie inguinale of Chaussier, occurs; which would be more common, were it not for the fibrous cellular septum there situate.

CRURAL NERVE proceeds from the lumbar plexus, and is situate at the outer side of the psoas muscle and crural artery. After it has passed under the crural arch, it divides into cutaneous and muscular branches. One of the branches, which is larger than the rest, is called the Saphæ'na nerve. It gives off filaments to the integuments of the knee, to the inner part of the leg, and to the dorsal surface of the foot. The remainder of the branches of the crural are distributed to the anterior and inner part of the thigh. The Ac'cessory of the Crural Nerve is a term given to the 4th and 5th pairs of lumbar nerves.

CRURAL PLEX'US of Chaussier is the union of the anterior branches of the last four pairs of lumbar nerves, and the first four sacral; forming the lumbar and sacral plexuses of most anatomists.

CRURAL RING, Crural canal — c. Septum, see Crural canal.

CRURAL VEIN, Fem'oral vein, has the same arrangement as the artery. It receives only one great branch, the saphæna.

CRURA'LIS, Cruræ'us. A part of the Triceps

crural of the French, or of the Triflémororotulien of Chaussier. The crural is situate at the anterior, outer, and inner part of the thigh. It arises, fleshy, from between the two trochanters, adheres firmly to most of the fore part of the os femoris, and is inserted, tendinous, into the upper part of the patella, behind the rectus. Its use is to assist the vasti and rectus in the extension of the leg. Under Muscle Triceps Crural, the French describe the cruralis and the two vasti. Some small muscular slips, sometimes found under the cruræus muscle, and inserted into the capsular ligament of the knee-joint, have been called Sub-cruræ'i.

CUTANEOUS EXHALA'TION AND ABSORP'TION are those which take place from the skin.

CUTANEOUS, MIDDLE POSTERIOR, see Sciatic nerve, lesser.

CUTANEOUS NERVES, Cuta'neal Nerves so called, of the upper extremity, are two in number. They are given off from the brachial plexus. The internal cutaneous. Cubito-cutané—(Ch.,) descends along the inner part of the arm, and divides above the elbow into two branches; the outermost of which follows the outer edge of the biceps, and spreads over the anterior and inner part of the forearm; and the innermost accompanies the basilic vein, passing to the corresponding side of the hand and little finger. The external cutaneous, Radio-cutané (Ch.,) Mus'culo-Cuta'neus, Per'forans CASSE'RII, passes outwards; perforates the coraco-brachialis; descends along the anterior and outer part of the arm; passes as far as the middle fold of the elbow under the median cephalic; and descends along the anterior and outer edge of the forearm. At some distance above the wrist, it divides into two branches; an outer, which is distributed on the back of the hand, the thumb and index finger; and an inner, which descends on the muscles of the thumb into the palm of the hand, and divides into fine filaments, which may be traced to the fingers.

Cutaneus nerves, Mid'dle cuta'neous, two in number, are branches of the crural or femoral nerve. They are distributed to the integument of the middle and lower part of the thigh and of the knee.

Nervus Cuta'neus Mi'nor, Les'ser inter'nal cuta'neous nerve, Nerve of Wris'berg, takes its origin from the axillary plexus, but is more particularly connected with the ulnar nerve. It soon separates from the ulnar, running afterwards between it and the inner side of the arm. A little below the axilla it divides into two branches, which are distributed to the arm.

Chaussier calls the cephalic and basilic veins the Ra'dial and Cu'bital Cuta'neous.

CU'TIS, Pel'lis, Pel'la, Co'rium, Der'ma, De'ris, Do'ra, Anthro'pē, Anthro'pen, Skin, Derm, (F.) Peau, Derme. A dense, resisting membrane, of a flexible and extensible nature, which forms the general envelope of the body; and is continuous with the mucous membranes, through the different natural apertures. It is generally considered to be formed of three distinct layers—the epidermis, rete, or more properly corpus mucosum, and corium (cutis vera, derma). Some anatomists, however, separate it into several others. Its outer surface is covered by a number of small eminences, called papillæ, which are generally regarded as essentially nervous and vascular. The skin is a medium of communication with external bodies. It protects the subjacent parts; is the seat of touch; and through it are exhaled the watery parts of the blood, which are not needed in the nutrition of the body. The state of the skin, as regards heat and dryness, affords useful information in pathological investigations. Its colour, too, requires attention: the paleness of disease is as characteristic as the rosy complexion of health. The colour of the skin varies according to the age, sex, &c. As a general rule, it is finer in the female and child than in the male and adult. In old age it becomes light-coloured, thin, and dry. It likewise varies according to races, &c.

munication remaining between the cavities of the right and left side of the heart; Pa'tency of the fora'men ova'lē, Acleitocardie of Piorry. Such communication does not, however, always occasion the blue disease, but it is generally thought that the disease never exists without this state of parts; or without some obstacle to the circulation in the right side of the heart. The blueness does not seem to be owing to the admixture of black and red blood. A child affected with blueness is said to be cyano'sed, (F.) Cyanosé.

CYNANCHĒ, Angi'na, (cyno, and αγχω, 'I suffocate' [?] 'dog choak,') Sorethroat; Paracynan'chē, Synan'chē, Prunel'la, Empres'ma Paristhmi'tis, Cau'ma Paristhmi'tis, Isthmi'tis, I aristhmi'tis, Inflamma'tio Fau'cium. Inflammation of the supradiaphragmatic portion of the alimentary canal, and of the lining membrane of the upper part of the air-passages:—(F.) Angine, Esquinancie, Mal de Gorge, Synancie, Squinancie, Kinuncie. It comprises the following chief varieties.

Cynanche Epidemica, Cynanche maligna—c. Externa, C. Parotidæa—c. Faucium, C. tonsillaris—c. Gangrænosa, Cynanche maligna—c. Laryngea, Laryngitis.

Cynanche Malig'na, C. gangræno'sa seu epidem'ica seu pur'puroparotidæ'a seu ulcero'sa, Cacocynan'chē, Pharyngoc'acē, Cacopharyn'gia, Fe'bris epidem'ica cum Angi'nâ, Empres'ma Paristhmi'tis Malig'na, Tonsilla'rum gangræ'na, Tonsil'læ pestilen'tes, Epidem'ica gut'turis lu'es, Pes'tilens fau'cium affec'tus, Pædan'chonē [?], Gangræ'na Tonsilla'rum, Ul'cus Syri'acum, Mor'bus Syri'acus seu suffocati'vus seu suff'ocans, Garotil'lo, Carbun'culus angino'sus, Angi'na ulcero'sa seu ulcusculo'sa seu epidem'ica seu gangræno'sa seu malig'na seu fau'cium malig'na, Isthmoty'phus, Pu'trid or Ul'cerous Sorethroat, Gan'grenous Inflamma'tion of the Phar'ynx, (F.) Angine gangréneuse ou Maligne. It is characterized by crimson redness of the mucous membrane of the fauces and tonsils; ulcerations, covered with mucus; and spreading sloughs, of an ash or whitish hue; the accompanying fever typhus. It is often epidemic, and fancied to be contagious [?]; and is frequently found accompanying scarlet fever,—giving rise to the variety, Scarlati'na malig'na, Canker rash. Cynanche maligna has been made to include both diphtheritic and gangrenous pharyngitis. See Pharyngitis, diphtheritic.

The general treatment is the same as in typhus; and stimulant antiseptic gargles must be used, consisting, for example, of the decoction of bark and muriatic acid, a solution of chlorate of potassa, &c.

Cynanche Maxillaris, c. Parotidæa—c. Œsophagea, Œsophagitis.

Cynanche Parotidæ'a, C. Parot'idis seu exter'na seu maxilla'ris, Empres'ma Paroti'tis, Paroti'tis, P. epidem'ica seu erysipelato'sa seu contagio'sa seu spu'ria seu sero'so glu'tinē tu'mens, Paro'tia, Parotidi'tis, Angi'na maxilla'ris seu exter'na seu parotidæ'a exter'na, Gis'sa, Erythrochœ'ras, Genyocynanchē, Gnathocynanchē, Inflamma'tio paro'tidum, Infla'tio paro'tidum, Catar'rhus Bellinsula'nus, Mumps, Branks (Scotch), (F.) Inflammation de la Parotide, Oreillons, Ourles. The characteristic symptoms are:—a painful tumor of the parotid gland, or of the areolar tissue surrounding it, or of both, not of the suppurative kind; frequently extending to the maxillary gland. It is very conspicuous externally, and is often accompanied with swelling of the testis in the male, and of the mammæ in the female; the testes being sometimes absorbed afterwards. It is generally epidemic, and apparently contagious. [?] The treament is very simple; the adoption merely of the antiphlogistic plan, under which it usually soon disappears. When inflammation of the mammæ or testes supervenes, it must be treated as if idiopathic.

Epidem'ic Paroti'tis or Mumps is also termed Paroti'tis polymor'pha seu epidem'ica seu specif'ica.

Cynanche Pharynge'a, Empres'ma Paristhmi'tis Pharynge'o, Isthmi'tis, Pharyngi'tis, Inflamma'tio Pharyn'gis, Parasynan'chē, Angi'næ inflammato'riæ, Sp. iv. of Boerhaave. (F.) Angine Pharyngée, Catarrhe pharyngien. Inflammation of the pharynx.

This disease can hardly be said to differ, in pathology or treatment, from Cynanche tonsillaris. The same may be remarked of Cynan'chē Œsophage'a, Œsophagi'tis.

Cynanche Prunella, C. Tonsillaris—c. Purpuro-parotidæa, Cynanche maligna—c. Simplex, Isthmitis—c. Stridula, C. trachealis.

Cynanche Tonsilla'ris, C. fau'cium seu Prunel'la, Empres'ma Paristhmi'tis Tonsilla'ris, Synan'chē, Amygdali'tis, Bran'ci, Bran'chi, Hyan'chē, Tonsilli'tis, Tonsil'lia, Squinan'thia, Paristh'mia, Paristhmi'tis, Dyspha'gia inflammato'ria, Antiadi'tis, Angi'na inflammato'ria seu cum tumo'rē seu tonsilla'ris seu synocha'lis seu sanguin'ea seu ve'ra et legit'ima, Inflamma'tio Tonsillo'rum, Antiadon'cus inflammato'rius, Inflam'matory Sorethroat, Com'mon Squin'ancy, Squin'zey, Squin'sy or Quin'sy, (Old E.) Swensie, Swinacie, (F.) Amygdalite, Inflammation des Amygdales, Angine tonsillaire, Pharyngite tonsillaire, Esquinancie, Squinancie, Catarrhe guttural, Angine gutturale inflammatoire. The characteristic symptoms of this affection are, swelling and florid redness of the mucous membrane of the fauces, and especially of the tonsils; painful and impeded deglutition, accompanied with inflammatory fever. It is generally ascribed to cold, and is one of the most common affections of cold and temperate climates. It usually goes off by resolution, but frequently ends in suppuration.

Common sore throat is an affection of no consequence. It requires merely rest, and the observance of the antiphlogistic regimen. When more violent,—in addition to this,—bleeding, local or general, or both,—purgatives, inhalation of the steam of warm water; acid, or emollient gargles; rubefacients externally, or sinapisms or blisters. When suppuration must inevitably occur, the continued use of the inhaler must be advised, and an opening be made into the abscess as soon as pus shall have formed. If the patient be likely to be suffocated by the tumefaction, bronchotomy may be necessary.

Cynanche Trachea'lis, Cynan'chē laryngea' of some, C. strid'ula, Suffoca'tio strid'ula, Asth'ma infan'tum, Catar'rhus suffocati'vus Barbaden'sis, Angi'na polypo'sa seu membrana'cea seu pulpo'sa seu pernicio'sa seu inflammato'ria seu suffocato'ria seu strepito'sa seu cani'na seu exsudato'ria seu trachea'lis, Empres'ma bronchi'tis seu bronchlemmi'tis, Laryngi'tis et Tracheï'tis infan'tilis, Laryngi'tis exsudati'va seu membrana'cea seu polypo'sa, Laryngos'tasis seu Laryngotrachei'tis, Laryngotracheitis with diphtheri'tic exuda'tion, Laryngoc'acē, Orthopnœ'a cynan'chica, Cynanchorthopnœ'a, Pædan'chonē [?], Morbus Strangulato'rius, Trachi'tis, Tracheï'tis, Tracheli'tis, Tracheop'yra, Trachea'lia, Diphtheri'tis trachea'lis, Expectora'tio Sol'ida, Caum'a Bronchi'tis, Croup, Roup, Hives, Bold Hives, Choak, Stuffing, Ri'sing of the lights, (F.) Angine laryngée et trachéale, Laryngite avec production de fausses membranes, Laryngite pseudo-membraneuse. A disease characterized by sonorous and suffocative breathing; harsh voice; cough, ringing, or like the barking of a dog; fever, highly inflammatory. It is apt to be speedily attended with the formation of a false membrane, which lines the trachea beneath the glottis, and occasions violent dyspnœa and suffocation, but is sometimes expectorated. The dyspnœa, as in all other affections of the air-passages, has evident exacerbations. It differs in its character in different situations; being infinitely more inflammatory in some than in others, and hence the success obtained from different modes of treatment. It chiefly affects children, and is apt to recur, but the subsequent attacks are usually less and less severe.

As a general rule, it requires the most active treatment; bleeding from the arm or neck, so as to induce paleness; leeches applied to the neck, &c., according to the age,—the warm bath, blisters to the neck or chest, and purgatives. Formidable as the disease may be, if this plan be followed early, it will generally be successful. Many specifics have been recommended, but the search has been idle and fruitless. The majority of cases of what are called croup are not of this inflammatory cast; but are more of a spasmodic character, and have been termed by the French faux croups, false croups, and with us are occasionally termed spasmodic croup. They generally yield to an emetic and the warm bath.

The root is sweet and mucilaginous; and the seeds have an aromatic odour, and moderately warm, pungent taste. The root has been used, as an emollient, to fetid and ill-conditioned sores. The seeds have been regarded as stomachic, carminative, and diuretic; but they have little efficacy. The seeds of the wild plant are, by some, preferred to those of the garden.

DAX, MIN'ERAL WA'TERS OF. Dax is a city two leagues from Bordeaux, where there are four springs, that are almost purely thermal; containing only a very small quantity of chloride of magnesium, and sulphate of soda and lime. Temperature 70° to 133° Fahrenheit.

DAZZ'LING, (dim of dazing,) Caliga'tio, (F.) Éblouissement. A momentary disturbance of sight, occasioned either by the sudden impression of two powerful a light or by some internal cause,—as plethora.

DE, (F.) dês, 'from,' as a prefix, signifies, at times, a downward movement; and at others a privative power, whilst at others again, it has an intensive signification.

DE VEN'TRE INSPICIEN'DO, 'of inspecting the belly.' Where there is reason to suppose that a woman feigns herself pregnant, a writ de ventre inspiciendo may be issued to determine whether she is so or not. Until recently, in England, the decision was left to twelve matrons and twelve respectable men, according to the strict terms of the ancient writ.

In most cases, however, the cause of the deafness is not appreciable, and the treatment has to be purely empirical. Syringing the ears, dropping in slightly stimulating oils, fumigations, &c., are the most likely means to afford relief.

DEATH, (Sax. ᵭeaᵭ,) (Sc.) Dede, Deid; Apobia'sis, Abio'sis, Extinc'tio, Ob'itus, Psychorag''ia, Psychorrhag''ia, Le'thum, Le'tum, Mors, Inter'itus, Than'atus, Decease', (F.) Mort. Definitive cessation of all the functions, the aggregate of which constitute life. Re'al Death, Apothana'sia, is distinguished from asphyxia or appa'rent death— the latter being merely a suspension of those same functions. But it is often difficult to judge of such suspension, and the only certain sign of real death is the commencement of putrefaction. At times, therefore, great caution is requisite to avoid mistakes. Death is commonly preceded by some distressing symptoms, which depend on lesion of respiration, circulation, or of the cerebral functions, and which constitute the ag'ony. That which occurs suddenly, and without any, or with few, precursory signs, is called sud'den death. It is ordinarily caused by disease of the heart, apoplexy, the rupture of an aneurism, or by some other organic affection. Death is natural, (Sc.) Strae-death, when it occurs as the result of disease: violent, when produced by some forcible agency. It may likewise affect the whole body, or a part only; hence the difference between somat'ic and molec'ular death.

The chief varieties of the modes of death usually admitted may be thus given

Death beginning at the heart,	{ sudden — Syncope: gradual — Asthenia.
"	"	in the lungs — Apnœa.
"	"	in the brain — Apoplexy.
"	"	in the gray matter of the medulla, { Paralysis of pneumogastrics, &c.
"	"	in the blood [?] — necræmia.

As it was at one time conceived, with Bichat, that death must commence in the heart, lungs, or brain, these organs were called a'tria mor'tis, 'the halls of death.'

DEATH, APPARENT, Asphyxia.

DEATH, BLACK, Melanothan'atus, Pes'tis ni'gra, Black Plague, (F.) Peste noire. The plague of the 14th century was so called, which is supposed to have proved fatal in Europe to 25,000,000 of people.

DEATH OF MAN, Cicuta maculata—d. Rate, see Mortality—d. Stiffening, Rigor mortis—d. Tranee, see Asphyxia.

DÉBANDER (F.), (de and bande, 'a bandage.') To remove a bandage or dressing, — as débander une plaie.

DEBILIS, ('weak,') Infirm. See the next word.

DEBIL'ITANTS, Debilitan'tia, Antidynam'ica, Philadynam'ica, (debilitare, itself from debilis, quasi dehabilis, 'weak,' 'to weaken.') Remedies exhibited for the purpose of reducing excitement. Antiphlogistics are, hence, debilitants.

DEBILITAS, gen. Debilita'tis, Debility — d. Erethisica, see Irritable — d. Nervosa, Neurasthenia, see Irritable — d. Visûs, Asthenopia.

DEBIL'ITY, Debil'itas, Asthen'ia, Hyposthen'ia, Blaci'a, Anenerge'sia, Anenergi'a, Weakness, (F.) Faiblesse. A condition, which may be induced by a number of causes. It must not be confounded with fatigue, which is temporary, whilst debility is generally more permanent.

Debility may be re'al, or it may be appa'rent; and, in the management of disease, it is important to attend to this. At the commencement of fever, for example, there is often a degree of apparent debility, which prevents the use of appropriate means, and thus is the cause of much evil. Excitement is more dangerous than debility.

DÉBOITEMENT, (de, and boiter, 'to be lame,') Luxation.

DÉBORDEMENT (F.), Déborde, (déborder, (de, and border,) 'to overflow.') A popular term for one or more sudden and copious evacuations from the bowels. It is chiefly applied to bilious evacuations of this kind.—Débordement de Bile.

DÉBRIDEMENT (F.) Fræno'rum solu'tio, (débrider, (de, and brider,) 'to unbridle.') The removal of filaments, &c., in a wound or abscess, which prevent the discharge of pus. In a more general acceptation, it means the cutting of a soft membranous, or aponeurotic part, which interferes with the exercise of any organ whatever; thus, in paraphimosis, débridement of the prepuce is practised to put an end to the inflammation of the glans; in strangulated hernia, débridement of the abdominal ring is had recourse to, to remove the stricture of the intestine, &c.

DEC'AGRAMME, (δεκα, 'ten,' and γραμμα, 'a gramme.') The weight of ten grammes, 154.34 grains Troy.

A pharmaceutical operation, which consists in pouring off, gently, by inclining the vessel, any fluid which has a deposit.

DÉCHAUSSOIR, Gum lancet.

DÉCHIRÉ, Lacerum.

DÉCHIREMENT, (from dilacerare, (di, and lacerare, 'to tear,') 'to tear to pieces.') Laceration.

DÉCHIRURE, Wound, lacerated—d. de l'Utérus, Uterus, rupture of the.

DECIDENTIA, (decidere, 'to fall off,' de, and cadere, 'to fall.') Cataptosis, Epilepsy.

DECIDUA, Decidua membrana.

DECID'UA MEMBRA'NA, Decid'ua, Decid'uous Mem'brane. So called on account of its being considered to fall off from the uterus at parturition. A membrane, formerly defined to be the outermost membrane of the fœtus in utero; and still so defined by some—as by Dr. Lee. Chaussier calls it Epicho'rion; by others, it has been called Perio'na, Membra'na cadu'ca Hunteri, M. flocculen'ta seu cellulo'sa seu sinuo'sa seu commu'nis seu præexis'tens, Decid'ua exter'na seu spongio'sa, Tu'nica exte'rior o'vi seu cadu'ca seu crus'sa, Membra'na cribro'sa seu o'vi mater'na seu muco'sa seu u'teri interu'a evolu'ta, Epio'nē, Placen'ta u'teri succenturia'tus, Subplacen'ta, Nidamen'tum, Anhis'tous mem'brane, (F.) Caduque, C. vraie, Membrane caduque, Épione, Périone;—prior to the time of the Hunters, called Cho'rion spongio'sum, seu tomento'sum seu fungo'sum seu reticula'tum, Tu'nica filamento'sa, Shag'gy Cho'rion, Spon'gy Cho'rion, &c. Great diversity has prevailed regarding this membrane and its reflected portion. It exists before the germ arrives in the uterus—and it has been met with in tubal and ovarial pregnancies; and is occasioned by a new action, assumed by the uterine vessels at the moment of conception. Chaussier, Lobstein, Gardien, Velpeau, and others, consider it to be a sac, without apertures, completely lining the uterus, and that when the ovum descends through the tube it, pushes the decidua before it, and becomes enveloped in it, except at the part destined to form the placenta. That portion of the membrane which covers the ovum, forms the Membra'na decid'ua reflex'a, (F.) Caduque réfléchie, Membrane caduque réfléchie, according to them; the part lining the uterus being the Decid'ua u'teri, (F.) Caduque utérine. Towards the end of the fourth month, the decidua reflex disappears. The very existence of a Tu'nica decid'ua reflex'a has, however, been denied. This last membrane has received various names. Dr. Granville, regarding it as the external membrane of the ovum, has termed it Cor'tex o'vi. It has also been termed Involu'crum membrana'ceum, Membra'na retiform'is cho'rii seu filamento'sa seu adventit''ia seu cras'sa, O'vuline and Decid'ua protru'sa. To the membrane which, according to Bojanus and others, is situate between the placenta and the uterus, and which he considers to be produced at a later period than the decidua vera, he gave the name membra'na decid'ua sero'tina, (F.) Membrane utéroëpichoriale Caduque sérotine ou secondaire.

Histological researches seem to show, that the decidua is an altered condition of the lining membrane of the uterus, with a whitish secretion filling the uterine tubular glands. The decidua reflexa is probably formed by the agency of nucleated cells from the plastic materials thrown out from the decidua uteri; in the same manner as the chorion is formed in the Fallopian tube from plastic materials thrown out from its lining membrane. That the decidua reflexa is not a mere inverted portion of the decidua uteri is shown by the fact, that the texture of the two is by no means identical.

Decidua Protrusa, Decidua reflexa.

DECIDUOUS MEMBRANE, Decidua (membrana).

DEC''IGRAMME, Decigram'ma, (decimus, 'the tenth part,' and γραμμα, 'gramme.') The tenth part of the gramme in weight; equal to a little less than two grains, French; 1.543 Troy.

DECIMA'NA FE'BRIS, (decem, 'ten.') An intermittent, whose paroxysms return every 10th day or every 9 days. It is suppositious.

DECLAMA'TION, Declama'tio, (de, and clamare, clamatum, 'to cry out.') The art of depicting the sentiments by inflections of the voice, accompanied by gestures, which render the meaning of the speaker more evident, and infuse into the minds of the auditors the emotions with which he is impressed. Declamation may become the cause of disease; the modification, produced in the pulmonary circulation,—accompanied by the great excitement, sometimes experienced,—is the cause of many morbid affections; particularly of pneumonia, hæmoptysis, and apoplexy. In moderation, it gives a healthy excitement to the frame.

DÉCLIN, Decline.

DECLINATIO, (de, and clinare, clinatum, 'to bend.') Decline.

DECLINE', Declina'tio, Inclina'tio, Decremen'tum, Remis'sio, Parac'mē, Parac'masis, (F.) Déclin. That period of a disorder or paroxysm, at which the symptoms begin to abate in violence, (F.) Décours. We speak, also, of the decline of life, or of the powers, (F.) Déclin de l'age, L'age de déclin, when the physical and moral faculties lose a little of their activity and energy. See Phthisis, and Tabes.

DÉCLIVE (F.), Decli'vis, (de, and clivis, 'acclivity.') Inclining downwards. This epithet is applied to the most depending part of a tumour or abscess.

DÉCOCTÉ, Decoction.

DECOC'TION, Decoc'tio, (decoquere, (de, and coquere, coctum,) 'to boil,') Epsé'sis, Apoz'esis, Ze'sis, Hepse'sis, Aphep'sis, (F.) Décoction. The operation of boiling certain ingredients in a fluid, for the purpose of extracting the parts soluble at that temperature. Decoction, likewise, means the product of this operation, to which the terms Decoc'tum, Ze'ma, Aphepse'ma, Ap'ozem, Apoz'ema, Hepse'ma, Chy'lus, and Epse'ma, (F.) Décocté, Hydrolé, Hydrolite, have been applied according to ancient custom, in order to avoid any confusion between the operation and its product;—as præpara'tio is used for the act of preparing; præpara'tum, for the thing prepared.

DELIV'ER, (PROV.) Lay, (de, and liberare, (F.) livrer, 'to set free.') 'To put to bed.' To disburden of a child.

DELIVERY, Parturition—d. False, False water.

DÉLIVRANCE (F.). An expression, which, in common language, signifies the action of delivering, libera'tio, but in the practice of obstetrics means the extrusion of the secundines, either spontaneously or by the efforts of art. This completion of delivery—par'tus secunda'rius, secundina'rum expul'sio seu extrac'tio—is produced by the same laws as the expulsion of the fœtus. Sometimes, the after-birth follows the child immediately; at others, it is retained; and requires manual interference to remove it. The following are the chief cases in which it has been practised. 1. Intimate adhesion between the placenta and paries of the uterus. 2. Spasmodic contraction of the orifice of the uterus. 3. Hour-glass contraction. 4. Torpor or hemorrhage after the expulsion of the child, and,—5. Insertion of the placenta at the orifice of the uterus.

DÉLIVRE, Secundines.

DELOCATIO, (de, and locus, 'a place.') Luxatio.

Syst.*, Polyandria Trigynia. (F.) Pied d'alouette des champs. It has been employed as a vermifuge. The flowers have been used in ophthalmia, and the seed Delphinium, (Ph. U. S.,) have the same property as those of Stavesacre.

DELPHINIUM CONSOLIDA, Delphinium—d. Segetum, Dolphinium.

DELPHIN'IUM STAPHISA'GRIA. The systematic name of the Staves'acre, Staphisagria, Phtheiroc'tonum, Phthei'rium, Sta'phis, Pedicula'ria, (F.) Staphisaig're, Herbe aux Poux, Dauphinelle. The seeds, Staphisa'gria, (Ph. L. and E.) have a disagreeable smell; a nauseous, bitterish, hot taste; and are cathartic, emetic, and vermifuge: owing, however, to the violence of their operation, they are seldom given internally, and are chiefly used in powder, mixed with hair powder, to destroy lice. An alkaloid of this plant has been separated, and received the name of Delphin'ia, Delphia, (F.) Delphine, Delphinine. It is extremely acrid, and has been recently used, like veratraria, in tic douloureux, paralysis and rheumatism. It is used in the form of ointment, or in solution in alcohol, (gr. x to xxx, or more, to ℥j,) applied externally.

DELPHINIUM VERSICOLOR, Delphinium.

DELPHYS, (δελφυς,) Uterus, Vulva.

shoulder, and covering the shoulder-joint. It extends from the outer third of the clavicle, from the acromion and spine of the scapula to near the middle and outer part of the os humeri, where it is inserted by means of a strong tendon. This muscle raises the arm directly upwards, when the shoulder is fixed, and carries it anteriorly or posteriorly, according to the direction of the fibres, which are thrown into action. If the arm be rendered immovable, the deltoid acts inversely and depresses the shoulder.

DELTOÏDE, Deltoid.

DELUSION, (de, and ludere, lusum, 'to play,') Hallucination.

In common parlance, and even in legal language, this word is synonymous with insanity. Physicians, however, have applied it to those cases of unsound mind which are characterized by a total loss of the faculty of thought, or by such an imbecility of intellect that the ideas are extremely incoherent, there being at the same time a total loss of the power of reasoning. Mania and melancholy are apt to end in this, if possible, more deplorable state. Do'tage is the Dementia of the aged—Mo'ria de'mens lere'ma, Lere'ma, Lere'sis, Le'rus, Delira'tio Se'num, Amen'tia Seni'lis, Pueril'itas, Delir'ium Seni'lē, Anil'itas, Se'nile Insan'ity, Se'nile Demen'tia, Insan'ity of the a'ged, (Sc.) Doittrie,—a form of insanity, in which there is a hopeless decadency or loss of the mental faculties.

Medicines supposed to be capable of correcting certain acrid conditions imagined to exist in the humours. Substances of a mucilaginous or saccharine nature belong to this class. Demulcents may act directly on the parts with which they come in contact; but in other cases, as in catarrh, their effect is produced by contiguous sympathy; the top of the larynx being soothed by them first, and indirectly the inflamed portion of the air-passages. In diseases of the urinary organs, they have no advantage over simple diluents.— See Diluents and Emollients. The following are demulcents;—Acaciæ Gummi; Althææ Folia et Radix; Amygdalæ; Amylum; Avenæ Farina; Cera; Cetaceum; Cydoniæ Semina; Fucus Crispus; Glycyrrhiza; Hordeum; Lichen; Linum; Olivæ Oleum; Sassafras Medulla; Sesamum; Sevum; Tragacantha, and Ulmus.

A disease, which first appeared in the years 1827 and 1828, in the West Indies, and in the southern states of North America. It was extremely violent in its symptoms, but not often fatal. It usually commenced with great languor, chilliness, and pain in the tendons about the smaller joints. To these symptoms succeeded burning heat and redness of the skin, pains in the muscles of the limbs or in the forehead, with vomiting or nausea. The fever continued for one, two or three days, and usually terminated by copious perspiration. In different places, it put on different appearances; but seems in all to have been a singular variety of rheumatic fever. The usual antiphlogistic treatment was adopted, and successfully.

DENTIT''ION, Teeth'ing, Dentit''io, Denti'tis, Odontophy'ia, Odonti'asis, Odonto'sis, (dentire, dentitum, 'to breed teeth.') The exit of the teeth from the alveoli and gums; or rather the phenomena which characterize the different periods of their existence. The germs of the first teeth, dentes lac'tei or milk teeth, (F.) dents de lait, are visible in the fœtus about the end of the second month; and they begin to be ossified from the end of the third to that of the sixth month. At birth, the corona of the incisors is formed, but that of the canine is not completed; and the tubercles of the molares are not yet all united. Gradually, the fang becomes developed; and at about six or eight months begins, what is commonly called, the first dentit''ion, Odon'tia dentitio'nis lactan'tium. The two middle incisors of the lower jaw commonly appear first; and, some time afterwards, those of the upper jaw; afterwards, the two lateral incisors of the lower jaw; and then those of the upper, followed by the four anterior molares; the canine, or eye-teeth, at first, those of the lower, and, afterwards, those of the upper jaw, next appear; and, subsequently and successively, the first 4 molares — 2 above and 2 below, 1 on each side. The whole number of the primary, temporary, deciduous, shedding or milk-teeth, (dentes tempora'rii,) (F.) Dents de lait, is now 20.

The eruption of the milk teeth takes place, approximately, in the following order:

Central incisors	6th to 8th month.
Lateral incisors	7th to 10th month.
First molar	12th to 14th month.
Canines	15th to 20th month.
Second molar	20th to 30th month.

The sec'ond dentit''ion or shed'ding of the teeth, odon'tia dentitio'nis pueri'lis, Dedentit''ion, begins about the age of 6 or 7. The germs or membranous follicles of these second teeth — to the number of 32—as well as the rudiments of the teeth themselves, are visible, even in the fœtus, with the exception of those of the small molares, which do not appear till after birth. They are contained in alveoli of the same shape as those of the first dentition. Their ossification commences at from 3 to 6 months after birth, in the incisors and first molares; at eight or nine months, in the canine; about three years, in the molares; 3½ in the second great molares, and about 10 years in the last. As the alveolus of a new tooth becomes gradually augmented, the septum between it and that of the corresponding milk tooth is absorbed, and disappears. The root of the milk tooth is likewise absorbed; its corona becomes loose and falls out, and all the first teeth are gradually replaced by the per'manent teeth, Den'tes serot'ini. This second dentition becomes necessary in consequence of the increased size of the jaws. The new teeth have neither the same direction nor the same shape as the old; and they are more numerous, amounting until the age of 25, (sooner or later,) to 28. About this period, a small molaris appears at the extremity of each jaw, which is called wis'dom tooth, wit tooth, Dens sapien'tiæ seu serot'inus seu sophroret'icus seu sophronis'tus seu sophronis'ter seu opsi'gonus, Ops'iodous, (F.) Arrière dent, Dent de sagesse, making the whole number of permanent teeth 32.

The eruption of the permanent teeth is remarkable for its general regularity; so that it constitutes an important means for ascertaining the age of the individual during the early period of life.

First molars	7th year.
Central incisors	8th year.
Lateral incisors	9th year.
First bicuspids	10th year.
Second bicuspids	11th year.
Canines	12th year.
Second molars	13th year.

The teeth of the lower jaw generally precede by a few weeks those of the upper.

During the period of dentition, that is, of the first dentition, the infant is especially liable to disease;—the irritation, produced by the pressure of the tooth on the superincumbent gum, sometimes occasioning pyrexia, convulsions, diarrhœa, &c., which symptoms are often strikingly relieved by a free division of the distended gum. This disordered condition is called Teeth'ing, Odon'tia dentitio'nis, Odonti'asis, Odontal'gia dentitio'nis, Odaxis'mus.

DENTITIS, (dens, and itis,) Dentition.

DEPILA'TION, Depila'tio, Epila'tion, Dropacis'mus, Made'sis, Mad'isis, Psilo'sis. Loss of hair, either spontaneously or by art.

DEP'ILATORY or DEPIL'ATORY, Depilato'rium, Psilo'thron, Ecthlot'icus,, Epilato'rium, (F.) Dépilatoire, Dépilatif, Epilatoire. Any thing which causes the loss of the hair. Depilatories are usually caustic applications, in which quicklime or some other alkaline substance, sulphuret of iron, &c., enter.

Depilatory, Col'ley's, seems to consist of quicklime and a portion of sulphuret of potassa.

Delcroix's depilatory, and Plenck's depilatory, have a similar composition. They all, probably, contain arsenic, in the form of orpiment. The following formula has been given for that of Colley: quicklime, 30 parts; soap lees, 125 parts; sulphur, 4 parts; nitre, 4 parts; orpiment, 12 parts. Another depilatory by F. Boudet is formed of sulphuret of sodium, 3 parts; quicklime, in powder, 10; starch, 10; mix. Rub a little of this powder with water; apply it to the part, and remove the hair in a minute or two with a wooden knife. Dorvault recommends the Depilatory of Martius, which is a sulphuretted sulphuret of calcium; made by passing sulphohydric acid into quicklime to saturation. A little of this is applied to the part, and in eight or ten minutes it becomes solid. It must then be washed off with cold or hot water, when the skin will be found denuded. Another, given by Redwood, is a strong solution of the sulphuret of barium, made into a paste with starch powder. It is used like the one advised by Boudet. Those that do not contain arsenic are, of course, safer.

DIABÈTE, Diabetes—d. Chyleux, Chyluria—d. Faux, see Diabetes—d. Insipide, see Diabetes—d. Sucré, Diabetes (mellitus).

DIABE'TES, (διαβητης, from dia, and βαινω, 'I pass.') Uri'næ profiu'vium, Hyperdiure'sis, Si'phon uri'næ, Urorrhag'ia, Polyu'ria, Hy'drops ad Mat'ulam seu Matel'læ, Polyure'sis, Uroze'mia, Ureorrhœ'a, Dip'sacus, Diarrhœ'a in Uri'nâ seu urino'sa, (F.) Diabète, Flux d'Urine. A disease characterized by great augmentation, and often manifest alteration in the secretion of urine; with excessive thirst and progressive emaciation. Cullen has described two species:—Diabétes insip'idus and D. Melli'tus; the former, (F.) Diabète faux ou insipide, Diabète being, simply, a superabundant discharge of limpid urine, of its usual, urinary taste; the latter, D. Melli'tus, called, also, Paru'ria Melli'ta, Diabétes An'glicus seu ve'rus, Melitu'ria, Melithypcru'ria, Glucosu'ria, Glycyrrhœ'a urino'sa, Uroze'mia melli'ta, Saccharorrhœ'a urino'sa, Phthisiu'ria, Urophthi'sis, Ta'bes diureti'ca seu diabe'tica, Dyspepsia saccharig''ena, Apoceno'sis Diabe'tes Melli'tus, Sac'charine diabe'tes, (F.) Diabète sucré, Hyperurorrhée saccharine, Phthisurie sucrée,—falls under the definition given above. The quantity of urine, discharged in the 24 hours, is sometimes excessive, amounting to 30 pints and upwards; each pint containing sometimes 2½ oz. saccharine matter. This replaces the urea, which is not found in quantity in the urine of those laboring under diabetes. Where the disease is situate is not clear. The whole system of nutrition, however, seems to be morbidly implicated. A part of the urine must be formed at the expense of the system, as the egesta frequently far exceed the solid and liquid ingesta. On dissection, no morbid appearance is met with sufficient to enable us to fix on the seat of this distressing affection.

All the remedies that have been tried have usually been found insufficient in D. Mellitus.

D. insip'idus, Hyperure'sis aquo'sa, Hydru'ria, Hydrure'sis, Paru'ria incon'tinens aquo'sa, Diabe'tes spu'rius, Urorrhœ'a, U'real Diabe'tes, (F.) Polyurie, Hyperurorrhée, Diabète insipide, Faux diabète, which occurs in hysterical habits, and has, hence, been called D. hyster'icus, is of comparatively trifling moment. Exclusive diet, and attention to the state of the cutaneous transpiration, which have sometimes produced good effects in D. Mellitus, have most commonly failed.

DIAPHRAGMATIC or PHREN'IC AR'TERIES. These are distinguished into superior and inferior. The former, called, also, supradiaphragmatic, are two in number, one on each side. They arise from the internal mammary, and descend along the phrenic nerve, to be distributed on the upper surface of the diaphragm. The latter or infradiaphragmatic are also two in number. They arise from the upper part of the abdominal aorta, or from the cœliac artery, and divide into two principal branches, which are distributed on the lower surface of the diaphragm and in its substance.

The superior diaphragmatic veins follow the same course as the arteries, and empty themselves—the right, into the vena cava superior; the left, into the corresponding subclavian vein. The two inferior diaphragmatic veins open into the vena cava inferior.

DIAPHRAGMATIC or PHREN'IC NERVES, Internal respiratory of Sir Charles Bell, are two in number; one on the left side, the other on the right. They arise from the second and third nerves of the cervical plexus, about the middle of the neck, and receive two or three filaments from the brachial plexus, after which they descend into the chest at the sides of the pericardium, and are distributed to the diaphragm.

A disease characterized by frequent liquid alvine evacuations, and generally owing to inflammation or irritation of the mucous membrane of the intestines. It is commonly caused by errors in regimen, the use of food noxious by its quality or quantity, &c., constituting the Diarrhœ'a stercora'ria, D. Crapulo'sa of writers. It may be acute or chronic. Many varieties have been made by some nosologists — e. g. mucous, — Diarrhœ'a muco'sa, Blennoche'sia, Blennoche'zia, Mycodiarrhœ'a; bilious, —Ileo-cholo'sis, Cholodiarrhœ'a, Diarrhœ'a bilio'sa; serous,—Hydroche'zia, Hydrodiarrhœ'a, Orrhoche'zia; dependent upon the matters evacuated. Diarrhœa requires different treatment, according to its nature. If caused, as it often is, by improper matters in the intestinal canal, these must be evacuated; and the astringent plan of treatment must not be adopted, unless the discharges seem kept up by irritability of the intestines, or unless they are colliquative. The indiscriminate use of astringents is to be deprecated.

A very fatal diarrhœa prevails amongst the native inhabitants of India, to which Mr. Tytler has given the name Diarrhœ'a hec'tica, because, like hectic fever, it seems to obtain habitual possession of the constitution, to operate upon it with scarcely any perceptible intermission, and in general, to defy the most powerful remedies.

DI'ES, He'mera, 'A Day,' (F.) Jour. The day is, properly, the period during which the solar light illumines our horizon; but commonly, also, we designate by the word day the period of 24 hours, Nycthe'meron, which is frequently divided into four parts—morning, midday, evening, and midnight. In antiquity, great importance was attached to the observation of days in disease. The medical day is usually reckoned at 24 hours,—universally, in estimating the duration of a disease. In parts of the United States, it comprises only the time when the sun is above the horizon, as regards the administration of medicine, so that if a medicine be ordered to be taken four times a day, it is understood to mean during the 12 hours of day.

DI'ET, (διαιτα,) Dix'ta, Dixte'ma, (F.), Diète. Originally, this word signified nearly the same thing as Hygiene and Regimen,—that is, Diet was the employment of every thing necessary for the preservation of health and life. At the present day, it usually signifies a particular kind of food and drink. Also, abstinence:—to put any one upon diet, (F.) mettre quelqu'un à la diète, means to deprive him of his usual nourishment. The terms milk diet, Dix'ta lac'tis, ; flesh or meat diet, Dix'ta car'nis; soup or broth diet, Dix'ta ju'ris vel jus'culi, &c., explain themselves. See Aliment, Hygiene, and Regimen.

DI'ETARY, Victûs Ra'tio. A regulated diet or allowance of food. Every large hospital, military or civil; every prison and eleemosynary institution of every kind, has certain dietetic regulations, and many of them have Tables of Dietary or Diet Scales, which are more or less implicitly followed. See Diet.

The Diet Scale of the British Navy allowed from 31 to 35½ ounces of dry nutritious matter daily; of which 26 ounces were vegetable, and the rest animal—9 ounces of salt meat, or 4½ ounces of fresh. That of the Navy of the United States has been as follows:—Three days in the week—Pork, 16 oz.; beans or peas, 7 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.; sugar, 2 oz.; tea, ¼ oz.;—40¼ oz. Two days in the week—Beef, 16 oz.; flour, 8 oz.; fruit, dried, 4 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; tea and sugar, 2¼ oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.;—45¼ oz. Two days in the week—Beef, 16 oz.; rice, 8 oz.; butter, 2 oz.; cheese, 2 oz; biscuit, 14 oz.; tea and sugar, 2¼ oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.;—45¼ oz. The daily Diet allowance to the British soldier has been one pound of bread, and three-quarters of a pound of meat. In the Army of the United States, the quantity of beef, salt or fresh, issued per day, is a pound and a quarter; of pork or of bacon, three-quarters of a pound. Ordinarily, the soldiers have fresh meat four days in the week, and salt meat the other three days; but every diet scale is subject to mutations in the individual articles. It must combine, however, a due admixture of nitrogenized, nonnitrogenized, and inorganic materials. See Aliment. The work of Dr. Pereira on 'Food and Diet,' and the Treatise on Hygiene by Dr. W. A. Hammond, of the United States Army, 1863, contain numerous Dietaries, civil and military. See, also, Ration.

A branch of medicine, comprising the rules to be followed for preventing, relieving, or curing diseases by diet. Dietetics is diet administered according to principle. It is an important part of Hygiene. A well regulated system of diet has great power in checking disease, and likewise in preventing it. A proper knowledge of dietetics is, indeed, as important as that of the Materia Medica, strictly so called.

Dietetics has been used, also, synonymously with Hygiene.

(F.) Mastoïdohyoygénien, Mastoïdoge'nien—(Ch.), Digastrique, Abaisseur de la machoire inférieure. The name Digastricus was formerly given to several muscles. It is now restricted to one of the muscles of the superior hyoid region. The digastricus is thick and fleshy at its extremities, thin and tendinous at its middle. It is attached to the mastoid groove of the temporal bone, and to a fossette at the side of the symphysis menti. Its tendon passes through an aponeurotic ring, which is attached to the os hyoides.

The use of the digastricus is to depress the lower jaw, or to raise the os hyoides, and to carry it forwards or backwards, as in deglutition.

The strong double-bellied muscle, which forms the gizzard of birds, is also called Digastricus.

All food is not equally digestible, and some of the most important is the least so:—the fat of meat, for example. Certain substances, again, are entirely rebellious. As a general rule, albuminous aliments—as tender mutton and beef, are the most easily appropriated.

DIGESTIF, Digestive.

DIGESTIO, Digestion—d Depravata, Dyspepsia—d. Difficilis, Dyspepsia—d. Læsa, Dyspepsia.

DIGES'TION, Diges'tio, (from digere, digestum, 'to digest;') Coc'tio, C. Cibo'rum, Pep'sis, Diges'tive Proc''ess. Digestion is a function, by means of which alimentary substances, when introduced into the digestive canal, undergo different alterations. The object of it is to convert them into two parts; the one, a reparatory juice, destined to renew the perpetual waste occurring in the economy: the other, deprived of its nutritious properties, to be rejected from the body. This function is composed of a series of organic actions, differing according to the particular organization of the animal. In man they are eight in number, viz.: 1. Prehension of food. 2. Mastication. 3. Insalivation. 4. Deglutition. 5. Action of the stomach. 6. Action of the small intestine. 7. Action of the large intestine. 8. Expulsion of the fæces.

DIGESTION is also a pharmaceutical operation, which consists in treating certain solid substances with water, alcohol, or other menstruum, at a slightly elevated temperature,—in a sand-bath, for example, or by leaving them exposed for some time to the sun.

DIGITA'LIS, (from digitale, because its flower resembles a finger stall,) Digita'lis purpu'rea, Bac'charis, Bac'char, Bac'car [?], Foxglove, (Sc.) Deadmen's bells, (Prov.) Flop'dock. Ord. Scrophularineæ. Sex. Syst. Didynamia Angiospermia. (F.) Digitale, Gants de notre dame, Doigtier. The leaves of this plant, which are indigenous in Great Britain, are powerfully sedative,—diminishing the velocity of the pulse, diuretic, and sorbefacient. In over-doses, Digitalis causes vomiting, purging, dimness of sight, vertigo, delirium, hiccough, convulsions, and death:—all the symptoms, in short, which characterize the acro-narcotic class of poisons. Its active principle has been called Dig''italine or Dig''italin, Digitali'num (Ph. B. 1864). It is said to be a hundred-fold stronger than the most active preparation of digitalis.

Digitalis has been administered in inflammatory diseases, phthisis, active hemorrhage, dropsy, &c.; but although it is a powerful remedy, it has not been as much employed as it probably would have been in particular cases, owing to the over-strained eulogiums, which many have passed upon it in almost all diseases. The average dose is one grain, in the form of pill, which may be repeated every six or eight hours.

DIGITALIS MINIMA, Gratiola officinalis.

(F.) Délayants. Medicines which have been conceived proper for augmenting the fluidity of the blood and other animal liquids. All aqueous drinks are diluents. They are administered, with great advantage, in various diseases. In fever, water, which is the most familiar diluent, may be freely allowed; the only precaution being to give it hot in the cold stage, cold in the hot, and tepid in the sweating. In diseases, where it is considered necessary to abstract blood largely, diluents should not be given too freely. The abstraction of blood occasions activity of absorption, and the mass is speedily restored. It is also obvious, that in cases of inflammation of the mammæ, in nurses, diluents should not be freely allowed, as they increase the secretion of milk, and add to the irritation. When demulcents are exhibited in cases of urinary disease, they act simply as diluents; their mucilaginous portion is digested in the stomach and small intestine, — the watery portion alone being separated by the kidney.

Those most commonly employed are: chlorine, sulphurous and chlorohydric acid gases, vapours of vinegar, nitrous acid, and what is, perhaps, the most manageable of any, chlorinated lime, or any of the chlorides of the alkalies. It is more than questionable whether any chemical action occurs between these agents and the miasmata, whence results a compound which is harmless, or in other words, whether there is any agent that is capable of destroying morbific miasms. Disinfection also includes the action of antiseptics.

The following fumigations have been largely employed as disinfectants.

The product of distillation is the distill'ate, (G.) Destillat.

The ancients distinguished distillation per latus, per ascen'sum, and per descen'sum, according to the direction which the volatilized matters were made to take. In distillation per latus, the apparatus is so arranged, that the vapour passes horizontally through a succession of spaces before reaching the receiver. Distillation per ascensum is the ordinary method by the still. In distillation per descensum, the fire is applied above and around the top of the apparatus; and it is so arranged that the vapour must pass downwards. Frac'tional distilla'tion is when ingredients volatilized at different degrees of heat are separated from each other during the process. When dry organic matter is placed in an apparatus for distillation, and heat is applied until all volatile matter is driven out, the process is called dry or destructive distillation.

To this class belong squill, juniper, digitalis, &c. DOSAGE, (from dose,) Posology.

DOSE, Do'sis, (δοσις, from διδωμι, 'to give,') Præ'bium, (F.) Prise. The quantity of any substance, which ought to form part of a compound medicine, or ought to be exhibited singly, to produce a desired effect. Many circumstances influence the doses of medicine. Women require smaller doses, as a general principle, than men. Habit has a great effect, as well as climate, age, and idiosyncrasy: all these, and other circumstances, must be taken into account; and every general rule on the subject will be found to have numerous exceptions. Some of the mechanical physicians laid it down as a rule, that the doses of medicines must always be as the square of the constitution!—A matter not easy of calculation.

The following Tables will exhibit an approximation, but only an approximation, to the proper doses (according to age) of most substances.

TABLE OF DOSES ACCORDING TO AGE.

Age 24	Let the full dose be	1 drachm.
18	will require	2-3ds. 2 scruples.
14	- - - -	half. ½ drachm.
7	- - - -	1-3d. 1 scruple.
4	- - - -	1-4th. 15 grains.
3	- - - -	1-6th. 10 grains.
2	- - - -	1-8th. 8 grains.
1	- - - -	1-12th. 5 grains.

The table of doses, according to age, recommended by Dr. Thomas Young, differs in some respects from the above. It, also, affords a general approximation. His rule is, that

For children, under twelve years of age, the doses of most medicines must be diminished in the proportion of the age to the age increased by twelve:

Thus, at two years, to 1-7th; i.e. $1\text{-}7\text{th} = \frac{2}{2+12}$

At twenty-one the full dose is given.

DOSES, BROKEN, (F.) Doses réfractées. When an agent is given in small portions it is said to be in broken doses,—refractis dosibus, (F.) à Doses refractées.
